William Villehardouin, like Faust, married a Greek princess, but he left no male heirs, and after his death the Latin power in Achaia began to decline. Female succession was one of the difficulties in the Latin States of Greece, just as it was a source of discord and weakness in the Crusading States of Syria. Women appear frequently in the story, playing, too often, tragic parts, like Marguerite the lady of Akova, or the princess Matilda of Hainault and Achaia. The women's Parliament of Nikli is an interesting illustration of their influence. In the battle of Pelagonia (A.D. 1259) William Villehardouin was taken prisoner and nearly all the barons of his principality were slain or captured. Three years later, the victor, who was the Emperor Michael Palaeologus, offered to release the captives if three of the most important castles in Achaia were handed over to him. The High Court of Achaia met to decide the question. The assembly—with the exception of the Duke of Athens who, as Bailie of Achaia, convened it, and two other men—consisted entirely of women, the wives and widows of the prisoners and the dead. The Bailie spoke strongly against agreement to such dangerous terms; the other men took his side; but the women were all in favor of yielding, and they carried the day. "It was only natural," Mr. Miller observes, "that with an assembly so constituted sentiment should have had more weight than reasons of State." But is "sentiment" quite a fair word to use?

The surrender of the fortresses, coming soon after the Greek recovery of Constantinople, marked the first degree in the descent of Frankish rule from its zenith. The Angevins of Naples then come on the scene. Charles of Anjou becomes first suzerain, then prince, of Achaia; but his political plans range far beyond the limits of the peninsula; he aims at the restoration of the Latin Empire. The plans and power of the Angevins were checked by the Sicilian Vespers, and not the least important consequence of that massacre was its effect on events in Greece. The peace of Caltabellotta ended the struggle of Spaniard and Angevin for Sicily (A.D. 1302), and then the band of Catalan mercenaries who were fighting for Aragon, finding their occupation gone, turned eastward in quest of fortune, and under the name of the Catalan Grand Company introduced a new and disturbing element into the politics of the Levant. "What the Fourth Crusade was to the thirteenth century," says Mr. Miller, "the Catalan expedition was to the fourteenth, only that the rough mercenaries from Barcelona showed less regard for the Greeks than the motley band of younger sons and noble adventurers and astute Venetians." And Ramon Muntaner did for the Catalans in his delightful history of their adventures what the Marshal Villehardouin had done for the Fourth Crusaders. The upshot of the expedition of these soldiers of fortune was the occupation of the Duchy of Athens, which they wrested from its Burgundian lords. They were excommunicated by Rome as "sons of perdition," but it was presently convenient for the policy of the Popes to receive them back into the fold. "Soon after they became respectable," as Mr. Miller observes, "they ceased to be formidable." Athens next passed into the hands of a Florentine man of business, Nerio Acciajuoli, and the fall of the Catalans was caused by the passion of a woman, one of the endless instances in which female succession was fatal to thrones. Another crowd of adventurers from Spain, the Navarrese Company, soon appear on the scene, and establish the Navarrese principality of Achaia.

Meanwhile the Ottomans had begun to ravage the coasts and islands, and the fifth Act, the Turkish conquest, is at hand. These rapid transformations, which we have illustrated from two of the Latin States, and the constant appearances of new actors on the scene are bewildering, but the reader has a sure and lucid guide in Mr. Miller. In our opinion, two of the most instructive lines to follow in this complicated period are the policy of Venice and the revival of the Byzantine power. From Epirus in the West, from Bithynia in the East, the Greeks steadily recovered the lands of which they had been robbed; and, but for the simultaneous rise of the Ottoman power in Asia Minor and the Servian Empire in the Balkan peninsula, in the fourteenth century, it is probable that they would ultimately have won back all or almost all that the Latins had taken from them. Their last and most deadly struggle would have been with Venice. The long-sighted, calculating policy and masterly diplomacy of the Venetian Republic in the lands of the Levant would be a fruitful subject for a special monograph. There can be no doubt that the original act of partition which distributed the Byzantine Empire among the allies who conquered it was framed by the Venetians. They had the geographical knowledge and knew how to use it in the interests of their city. She profited more than any other power by the transactions which are known as the Fourth Crusade.

THE STORY OF THE SCAFFOLD.*

We were publicly hanging men and women during a period of nearly eight hundred years. The origin of Tyburn, Mr. Marks says, is certainly Norman; he assigns it to the reign of Henry I. Testimony to this is furnished by its early name, "The Elms"; for among the Normans the elm was the tree of justice. We are thus carried back to the beginning of the twelfth century, and from this date Tyburn gallows (the "Three-legged-Mare," the "Three-legged Stool," or "Deadly-Never-Green") is in full view until the shadows begin to lengthen on the eighteenth century. The last execution at Tyburn took place on November 7th, 1783. But the horrid revel of the public hanging continued in full blast long after this. Not until Queen Victoria had been thirty-one years upon the throne did the average British conscience decide that the saturnalia must cease. Mr. Marks, confining himself to Tyburn, makes no mention of this, but it was on May 26th, 1868, under the walls of Newgate, that a London mob enjoyed for the very last time the death wriggles of a wretch with his head in a noose. Government was then bidden to do its hangings out of sight.

For six or seven centuries Tyburn was our most distinguished field of blood. The crowd that fares thither is past numbering:—

> "It is for the most part a nameless, unrecorded crowd. For hundreds of years only a single figure emerges here and there from the throng. During a few decades only of the history of Tyburn do we see clearly and in detail the figures in these dismal processions. They go, in batches of ten, fifteen, twenty, laughing boys, women with children at the breast, highwaymen decked out in gay clothes for this last scene of glory; men and women drunk, cursing, praying. Some of the women are to be burnt alive; of the men, some are to be simply hanged; others, first half-hanged, are to have their bowels torn out and burnt before their eyes; some are to be swung aloft till famine cling them."

Of those who suffered at Tyburn, the English Aceldama, Mr. Marks thinks that a moderate computation might fix the number at fifty thousand; but who shall say? Histories of England are anything but garrulous on the subject. In the most recent one, the very interesting posthumous work of the late Dr. F. W. Maitland, we have not once found the name of Tyburn. For proper, accurate, unflinching treatment of a humiliating theme that ought not to be shirked, we must have recourse to such a monograph as the one before us.

In old Paris, it has been said, prisons were as thick as churches. In old England, it might almost be said, every gentleman had his gallows on his lawn. Among the franchises granted to monasteries we find one of "furca et fossa"—a gallows for men; and a pit, filled with water, for women. The provision might not have been wholly ungrateful to the late Sir Fitzjames Stephen, who was for greatly increasing the number of capital offences.

For whom were all these trees of death set up? Chiefly it would seem, for the robber and the thief:—

> "Theft," says Stephen, "seems to have been the crime of crimes. The laws are inexorable towards it. They assume everywhere that thieves are to be pursued, taken, and put to death then and there."

One or two facts must be put in plea for the society of those days; a densely wooded country gave shelter to troops of marauders, and there was no police. When the Hutesium, or Hue and Cry, was raised, every man who heard it must turn policeman for the nonce; and from boundary to boundary the hunt must be kept up until nightfall. Hue and Cry might, and often did, spread panic for miles, and the chances were sore against the thief. The abbot who, in his ecclesiastical capacity, was obliged to give him shelter for the night, might, in his seigneurial capacity, hang him the next morning. Sadly limited, too, was the thief's field of operations. He could carry off what was portable, and could clip the King's coin; scarcely anything else. We are safer who live in the age of company promoting!

Thus briefly as regards those who might be executed. As for the question, How to execute them? there were several answers to that. We know not who was the first English hangman, nor who first discovered that a cord adjusted to a man's neck is admirably held in position by the projecting mass of the head. It is, in the words of the greatest of French satirists, "the pantagruelion, manufactured and fashioned into an halter, and serving in the place and office of a cravat." But the halter, albeit the most frequent, was not the sole means of despatching those whose lives were forfeit. "All that exceeds a simple death," said Montaigne, "appears to me absolute cruelty"; but the West and South have often rivalled the East in the ingenuity of their torments, and we ourselves have displayed upon occasion a fine Oriental abandon. Richard Cœur de Lion had the murderer buried alive with the body of his victim. In London, at the beginning of the fourteenth century:—

> "a man, convicted of treason in the Court of the Mayor, was bound to a stake in the Thames during two flows and two ebbs of the tide."

In 1531 "one Richard Rose, a cooke," for an attempt to poison the Bishop of Rochester, and in 1542 Margaret Davy, a maid-servant, for poisoning three households, were boiled in Smithfield. There exists, says Mr. Marks, "singular and terrible indirect evidence" that William, the sacrist of Westminster, for plundering the King's treasury, was flayed alive. Portions of his skin are believed to illustrate a door in the cloisters of Westminster Abbey. Farther, it is written in the "Grey Friars' Chronicle" that:—

> "a man of Oxenford faynyed hym selfe Cryste, and was crucified at Addurbury."

These flights of experiment call for notice; they were not such farthing stuff in their kind. On the whole, however, we appear to have thought hanging good enough; and there is no doubt that the pantagruelion, with a few well-devised extras, may be made what Sir Thomas More satirically calls a "strayte and rygorous justice." Let us for a moment consider the extras.

They were ordinarily two: drawing and quartering; and

Mr. Marks in discussing them corrects a mistake into which almost all historians, chroniclers, and novelists have fallen. They have almost all spoken of "hanging, drawing, and quartering"; but the true order of the punishments in cases of high treason was "drawing, hanging, and quartering." Mr. Marks says:—

> "Owing to this mistake it has not infrequently been assumed that drawing was a process following hanging, and consisted in drawing out the bowels of the victim. In fact, drawing meant drawing along the ground. There were three kinds of drawing. In the vast majority of cases drawing means dragging to the place of execution, where hanging, disembowelling, and quartering followed. But drawing sometimes means dragging till the sufferer died of the mere dragging. In some cases drawing means tugging by horses in opposite directions till the sufferer was torn to pieces."

In the earliest days of the scaffold's pride, the condemned, stripped to his shirt, was dragged on his back to the place of execution. This show was very well for spectators situated anywhere along the line of march, but those who had paid for the best places were disappointed, inasmuch as, when the culprit arrived at the scaffold, he was already three-parts dead. He must have been quite dead long before the hangman could have his chance of showing off in the disembowelling. Moreover, it was expected of the victim (nay, it was practically a part of the sentence) that he should sit up to watch the roasting of his intestines. Was it, then, as a provision of mercy, or as an intentional and artistic addition to his pains, that for the dragging on the back—three miles or more—was presently substituted the hurdle? The hurdle was succeeded by the cart; and from the cart, in the eighteenth century, we see Tyburn at its meridian sun. This was the Tyburn that Dr. Johnson would have preserved; and by his protest against the suppression of the public execution we may measure, in how small soever a degree, the expanding and liberalising of the public conscience in the years that separate us from him. For the thing that is historically conveyed to us under the name of Tyburn is itself already on the hurdle.

THE BEGINNING OF THE ROMAN FALL.*

Readers of Signor Ferrero's former volumes will give a hearty welcome to this fresh contribution to the knowledge of a puzzling and momentous period. They will find the same command of the materials, along with the same power of throwing a strong light on obscure classes, and on the social and financial consequences of a great political upheaval. Yet we cannot honestly say that this volume seems to us quite to maintain the high level of its predecessors. It covers a period of about six years, following the death of Julius, and it breaks off, with a certain abruptness, with the famous journey of Mæcenas to Brundisium. The volume is a short one, and it might easily have been made to close with some more important event. Moreover, the author's forte lies in the treatment of the social and economic aspects of a period, rather than in narrative or delineation of character. He is, as a rule, a very faithful, and almost too minute chronicler of passing events. But we cannot help feeling that, in the tangle of those years, we do not always see whither our guide is leading us. The confusion of parties and personal motives is almost too faithfully reproduced. We are sometimes as bewildered as their contemporaries were bewildered by the shifting tactics and intrigues of Antony and Octavian, and the varying moods of the Senate. Signor Ferrero rightly distrusts the so-called scientific treatment of history as an attempt to achieve what never has been, and never can be, done, that is, to narrate the story of the past with no intrusion of a subjective element. But we could have wished for a little more of the masterful manner of the great historians, from Thucydides down, in marshalling the materials so as to give the student some clue in the maze of crossing ambitions, disappointed hopes, impotent conclusion of great designs, tragic arrest of great movements, in which even genius often seems the mere sport of a cynical Fate. Moreover, the author hardly seems to us to be successful in giving us a clear conception of the leading characters of the time. Probably he meant us to gather that from his narrative, and to some extent he succeeds. But in his conception of Antony, Octavian, and Cicero, we miss the bold, strong lines of portraiture which make a character live in the imagination. Moreover, we venture to doubt whether his estimate of Octavian and Cicero does justice to men who have left so deep a mark on history. Octavian at nineteen, steering his way between the ambition of the brilliant lieutenant and pupil of Cæsar, and the wiles and blandishments of the republican party, surely merits a fuller recognition for his precocious prudence, his mingled daring and caution, his imperial outlook on the whole field of turbulence and social wreck. And although Cicero is here spared the ignominy with which German pedants have outraged an illustrious name, he surely deserves better than to be treated merely as the first of the men of letters who have plunged into politics. Cicero, in spite of many weaknesses, which he almost parades himself, was in many fine qualities of character a marvellous exception in an age torn with selfish ambition, enervated by vice, or cowed into selfish abandonment of all care for the commonwealth. In his intellectual range and versatility he has few peers in all the ages since his own. It is easy to sneer at his oratorical verbosity and want of originality as a thinker. But as a master of persuasion, the great judge has assigned him the highest place. He created a philosophic idiom for the West, and made the subtleties of Greek dialectic familiar to the Roman world. He created a style which in its wealth and harmony and clearness has fascinated all later ages, and will never cease to influence those who feel the power and music of artistic speech.

We have, with great respect, indicated where the author has fallen short of the ideal. But he has in this volume a most difficult subject, one to task the highest powers of the born historian. The murder of the Dictator was a great crime and a still greater blunder. It interrupted vast, beneficent plans of world-wide organisation. It left the Roman world without a government. It cost the new Empire half a generation of cruel civil war, financial chaos, corrupting intrigue, and social disorganisation. Signor Ferrero has followed through all its windings the tortuous policy of Antony in 44 B.C., partly dictated by fear, partly by ambition, partly also by the necessities of a great official position at the centre of a world. Slowly the position grew clearer amid the dust of party strife; the world could not be governed by the mob or the nobles of the Senate. Under the fierce dæmonic influence of Fulvia and his brother Lucius, he was driven to accept the traditions of Cæsarism, though he might abolish the dictatorship, and in order to control the Government, he must extort the command of the province which dominated Italy, along with the Macedonian legions. But his path was crossed by one who had the formal right to be regarded as the heir of Julius. Octavian, when he arrived from Apollonia, was treated with scant courtesy by Antony. But he soon developed into a dangerous rival. While Antony was in command of Cæsar's treasure and his more valuable papers, which could be manipulated or multiplied by artistic forgery, Octavian took upon himself the burden of the Dictator's lavish bequests. The subtle dexterity with which he obtained high command in the Republican army that defeated Antony at Modena, his appearance before Rome and daring seizure of the Consulship, his reconciliation with Antony, and the league of the Triumvirs, may all be studied with great profit in this book.

But far more interesting than these surprises of war or policy are the glimpses which the author gives us of the social life of the time. Rome, like the London of to-day, was a great centre of finance. The rumour of a fresh twist of policy in one of the great leaders spread panic in the markets and exchanges. Money was scarce in Italy, and even prosperous men like Cicero were hampered with debt. The demand of the veterans for settlement lay like a nightmare on rural Italy. It involved the assignment of more than 300,000 acres, with slaves and cattle, and the expropriation of owners, with a shadowy hope of indemnity. The ruined farmers flocked to the slums of Rome or infested the roads as brigands. In the confusion of civil war, the tribute of the eastern provinces, which were the gold mine of the West, no longer found its way regularly to the treasury. When the league of the Triumvirs was formed there were forty-three legions under arms, clamoring for pay or rapine. To satisfy their demands, a sum of at least £8,000,000 was needed without delay. The proscription which poured out the blood and drained the fortunes of one hundred Senators and two thousand knights was not the mere reckless vengeance of political hatred. It was an immoral necessity. The ghastly tragedy was perhaps the not undeserved Nemesis for centuries of imperial oppression and grinding exaction. It brought an effeminate and nerveless order to the dust. It extinguished houses coeval with the Republic, and threw countless estates on the market, where competitors were few and fabulous fortunes were founded in an hour.

In this scene of stealthy intrigue or cruel vengeance women bore an important part. The Roman lady had claimed and won her emancipation generations before Juvenal penned his indictment of the viragoes and bluestockings of his day. Servilia, the mother of Brutus, the mistress of the Dictator, was long at the centre of political intrigue. Fulvia, the widow of the turbulent P. Clodius, and wife of Antony, a woman of pitiless force and ambition, who gloated over the bleeding head of Cicero, when it was brought in by Antony's cut-throats, controlled the Senate for a time, made and unmade great magistrates, and raised a civil war against Octavian which was only quelled in the siege of Perugia. Antony's choice of the eastern provinces, with a frontier drawn through Scodra, gave him the inexhaustible wealth of favored regions, and anticipated by more than three centuries the great schism of Empire under Diocletian. It also threw him into the arms of Cleopatra. The royal harlot sold her favors for a great prize. She wished to guard the autonomy of Egypt, and she probably inspired her lover with the dream of an Eastern monarchy such as floated before the half-lunatic brain of Nero.

In the very years of this social cataclysm many a quiet student, in Campanian villas or on sequestered farms in Cisalpine Gaul, was brooding over the problems of the philosophy of Greece, or trying to catch and transfer the subtle charm and music of her verse into the idiom of Rome. In the perilous year which saw the death of Cæsar, Cicero, by a miracle of calm industry, composed the "De Officiis," the "De Natura Deorum," the "Tusculans," and the lost treatises on Glory and Fate, and the exquisite essays on Friendship and Old Age. Cornelius Gallus wedded the Celtic vivacity to Greek technique in elegiac verse. Virgil, who had suffered from the confiscations, but had been rescued by powerful friends, was meditating the early Eclogues, in which the charm of the old farm on the Mincio breaks through the conventionality of Alexandrian tradition. Amid the turmoil of cruel strife and hungry ambition were heard the notes of a music strange to the ancient world.

A TRAVELLER FOR SCIENCE.*

Dr. Galton's unabated interest in the problem of heredity prepares his readers for copious details concerning his ancestry. "My surviving brother is ninety-three; my own age is now only eighty-six," wherein lies proof that his forbears passed-on a fairly clean bill of health. Quakers on the spear-side; Darwins on the spindle-side; he traces inheritance of asthmatic troubles to a great-grandfather; and, mentally, on the maternal side, a passion for statistics shared by "his sisters, his cousins, and his aunts." Unharassed by "res angusta domi," he has been able through his long life to gratify every desire, never yielding to love of ease, but filling the days with willing service to his kind.

Schooldays over, he took up the profession of his famous grandfather, Dr. Erasmus Darwin, abandoning this when, at the age of twenty-two, ample means permitted him to gratify his love of travel and research. His medical curriculum was varied by a delightful tour abroad with William Bowman, the future eminent oculist, and, recalling experiences of pre-chloroform days, he tells us how alcohol proved a successful anæsthetic in the case of a dead-drunk drayman whose legs, crushed by a heavy waggon, were amputated without the patient missing them till he woke up sober next morning!

From his student days to old age, it was Dr. Galton's good fortune to come into more or less intimate relations with remarkable men: hence, no mean company defiles before us in these pages. His cousin, Charles Darwin, of course, an easy first; then Whewell, Huxley, Hallam, Tyndall, Alfred Russel (why will the printers persist in adding a second "1"?) Wallace, Mansfield Parkyns, of forgotten Abyssinian fame, Bates, and a host of others, to meet whom was "a liberal education." But the references are rarely illuminative. Too often we are tantalised by such remarks as when, for example, in speaking of a meeting with Huxley and fellow-savants, Dr. Galton says, "Never before have I had such refined and courteous conversational sword-play. I regret my inability to recall more than this general impression." Carlyle bored him; he hints truths about Stanley's fussy intrusion on Livingstone of which more is known than talked about; he gives an amusing reminiscence of taking Herbert Spencer to the Derby, where the philosopher likened "the disagreeable crowd to flies on a plate"; and when he talks of the buffoonery of the savants of the Red Lion Club, so called because, as "lions," they had met by chance during their prowl about the town where the British Association assembled, I wonder whether he was present on an occasion (Huxley told me the story) when Douglas Jerrold was a guest, and, invited to offer grace, shook his coat-tail and said, "Let us prey." The warm tribute—ever rendered by all who knew the man—which Dr. Galton pays to Bates reminds me how the latter laughingly described a visit to Dr. Galton, whom he found keenly interested in the invention of an improved toasting fork. For reference thereto among the many mechanical triumphs scheduled in the Appendix to this volume, the reader will search in vain.

More than sixty years ago, "saturated since the age of nine with Byron's poetry," Dr. Galton went to the near East. "Shepheard's Hotel then looked out upon rice-fields," and the journey to Suez was made in the overland waggons of Lieutenant Waghorn, the spirited, and now scarcely remembered, projector of steam communication between England and India. And nearly another sixty years passed before a second visit to Egypt offered the contrast of "bridge" and "afternoon tea" with the dread shadow of the Sphinx, at which, as Kinglake says, "you dare not laugh"; junketings unheeded by Dr. Galton as he sped to Abydos to revel in the sober sport of witnessing Professor Flinders Petrie's excavations. Between these periods Dr. Galton wrote the "Art of Travel," equipped for it by the exploration of Damaraland in 1850, carried out at his sole cost. His narrative of this, published in 1853, vividly records under what hardships travel was then prosecuted; hardships redeemed by whimsical incidents of the kind told in these "Memories." His bestowal of

> "a big theatrical crown, bought in Drury Lane, on the chief Nangoro had recognition in the arrival of a lady raddled with red ochre and butter, and as capable of leaving a mark on anything she touched as a well-inked printer's roller. As I was dressed in my one well-preserved suit of white linen, she was ejected with scant ceremony."

The prominence of Dr. Galton's labors in other fields has well-nigh eclipsed his work as an explorer, and his application of wide experience to the shamefully neglected cultivation of geography. But he will desire to be best remembered in his manifold activities for the physical and, therefore, psychical betterment of mankind. That he broke well-nigh virgin soil in this matter has evidence in his remark that he was accused of importing a fanciful and unusual meaning into the word "heredity," one cultured friend chaffing him for adopting it from the French! But he was satisfied as to "the inheritance of all the mental qualities into which he had inquired, and that heredity was a far more powerful agent in human development than nurture." Dr. Galton blended with this the supreme importance of exercise of restraint, as opposed to compulsion, for the common weal. He tells us that he takes Eugenics or Race Improvement "very seriously," and this inadequate tribute to his deeply interesting life-story may fitly end by quoting what he says on his pet theme in its closing sentences:—

> "Man is gifted with pity and other kindly feelings; he has also the power of preventing many kinds of suffering. I conceive it to fall well within his province to replace Natural Selection by other processes that are more merciful and not less effective. This is precisely the aim of Eugenics. Its first object

EIGHT VOICES.*

THE opinion has many times been advanced, explicitly and implicitly, that poetry, being so indefinable a matter, cannot with certainty be perceived at first sight. Since all the schoolmen and critics in the world have failed hitherto to catch poetry in a definition, how can an honest man be so hardy as to say of a new book: This is, or is not, poetry? The argument will only seem plausible to such unfortunate minds as are completely dominated by reason. It is true that no one can say precisely what poetry is, but it is also true that definitions have no more to do with recognising poetry than they have with recognising colors. Either the thing is there, or it is not. Or, if that seem too uncompromising, we may liken poetry to the note of a cuckoo. Small boys have a knack of blowing through their clasped hands so as to make a sound very close to the bird's two-fold shout; and unwary ears have taken the simulated call for genuine. But let a real cuckoo once declare itself from the copse, and neither ingenuity nor imitativeness have any longer power to deceive. There is no mistaking the actual voice; and when it has been heard clearly, the small boys waste their breath, except in so far as they entertain themselves.

Here are eight voices. We will not say that our task is to decide which are cuckoos and which small boys; for to apply our simile thus narrowly were to be scarcely complimentary to either division. But it will be quite fair to divide them into those whose song proceeds immediately from a natural impulse and those who sing out of a desire—an unconscious desire, perhaps—to be ingenious and imitative. Fortunately, of these eight voices, no less than three have the unmistakable ring of genuineness; and that makes the other members of the choir easier to assess than they might have been, if they had been heard by themselves. Mr. Leopold H. Myers, for instance, in his dramatic poem "Arvat," imitates poetry very ingeniously and very well; almost he persuades us. But after we have passed unalarmed several places where we know we ought to have been profoundly moved, it becomes evident that he possesses a sound knowledge of how great poets use their words, but not the elemental impulse which forces them into so using words. The poem is planned ambitiously and largely, if rather formlessly; but its characters are jerky in their movements, the psychology not at all notable, and the passions nearly always miss fire. Exactly the same criticisms may be preferred against Mr. Arthur Dillon's "Tragedy of Saint Elizabeth of Hungary," except that the imitation is more specific. There really is no necessity nowadays for the writer of tragedies to pretend to be an Elizabethan. Mr. Dillon seems far more anxious to prick in Elizabethan phrases and turns of speech than to make his characters passionate and alive. The third book on our list of eight is also in dramatic shape, "The Masque of the Grail," by Mr. Ernest Rhys. If Mr. Rhys had not added a note at the end of his poem in defence of its form, we might have allowed his title to pass without comment. Mr. Rhys is at liberty to use what form he likes, but we cannot see why he should have called it a masque. Dekker might just as well have so designated "Old Fortunatus"; but he did not, for he knew that there was no sense in calling a poem what it is not. The only reason why "Comus" seems so free in form is that the chief character of the ante-masque is carried on into the masque; the lineaments of the masque-form are perfectly apparent throughout. Mr. Rhys has written a spectacular, symbolic drama, containing personifications of death and tradition; but he has not written anything like a masque. As a spectacle, this new rendering of the Grail legend would undoubtedly be very pleasing and imposing, and its poetical weakness would not be too evident. It is written partly in prose and partly in metre, and it must be confessed that the departure from the typography of prose is hardly ever justified. However, the general structure of the play is certainly poetic.

Mr. Frank Hudson, who is, we are sure, himself a manly man, apparently considers that the manly man is under-estimated by the world at large. Accordingly, he has written "The Song of the Manly Men, and other Verses." But the manly man has not proved a very inspiring theme to Mr. Hudson; and, personally, we are inclined to be as suspicious of the man who talks of his manliness as of the woman who talks of her virtue. Perhaps it was not to be expected that a man, even a manly man, who could seriously entitle a poem "The Song of the Manly Men," would write anything but sorry verse. We advise Mr. Hudson to stick to his manliness, and avoid poetry.

We now come to a voice whose power to charm has been so long proved—a voice so pleasing and gracious, that it would be most unhandsome to deny it qualities beside ingenuity and imitativeness. The years have not changed Mr. Gosse's muse "to hoarse or mute"; "The Autumn Garden" contains as delightful verses as any that he has made hitherto. But Mr. Gosse is, as a poet, bi-formed. Without intending any disrespect, it may be said of him that he is often himself the cuckoo to expose himself acting the part of the ingenious small boy. While we are reading a poem with placid admiration for its cleverness, we are suddenly electrified by a stave of the authentic music, such as this, out of a poem called "Disillusion":—

> "Now that image quits the sky,
> Plunges like a falling star,
> Slips, out of the pride on high,
> Down, down, where the pities are."

This makes us less inclined to be patient with this sort of writing:—

> "The clouds are up, to sweep and tune
> That inharmonious harp, the moon;"

two lines which prelude, by the way, a very interesting piece of poetised atavism. But even when Mr. Gosse is writing cleverly, his cleverness is always thoughtful, suave, and charming, and so, eminently worth reading; and then there is always the chance that he will electrify us with something that is infinitely beyond cleverness.

Three books remain; and now we have got beyond questionable matters. We are now to deal with three poets who are continual partakers in the impulse out of which has come all that the world calls poetry. The two longest, and the two best, poems in Miss Jane Barlow's "The Mockers and other Verses," are tales written in an Irish dialect—which of the Irish dialects we do not know. We can only say that Miss Barlow uses it to make very beautiful and moving verse. The first of these, "The Mockers," is really a splendid tale; but they are both not only admirable as narratives, but also full of vigorous description and actual humanity. The lyrics which make up the rest of the volume are not quite so good; the sonnets, especially, are too charged with thought to be altogether pleasing. Miss Barlow is fond of using internal rhyme; her success in so doing makes us wish that this device were more often practised than it is. The two-fold beauty of art, the beauty in idea and the beauty in expression, is always to be found in Miss Barlow's poetry.

Everybody knows Mr. William Davies' history, and it is to be hoped that everyone also knows his poetry, for he sings an ecstasy that is indeed rare in these days. It would be hard to find in all our literature a more exquisite intimacy with the earth than that which he reveals in his latest book, "Nature Poems." He is, we are convinced, justified in his not inconsiderable boast, "Say what you like, All things love me!" In a song called "The Boy" he seems to reveal the secret of his magic: —

"Time is to thee
Eternity,
As to a bird,
Or butterfly;
And in that faith
True joy doth lie."

Mr. Davies has discovered true joy; in the midst of time he is in eternity. When he watches a robin singing, "half-way up his legs in snow," or sees how

"A stoat-like wind, without a sound, Doth creep and startle from the ground," then "gadding Time runs by" Mr. Davies. Of at least a dozen poems which we should like to quote for their sheer beauty, we will choose the following as being perhaps most typical:—

"I hear leaves drinking rain;
I hear rich leaves on top
Giving the poor beneath
Drop after drop;
'Tis a sweet noise to hear
These green leaves drinking near.

And when the Sun comes out,
After this rain shall stop,
A wondrous light will fill
Each dark, round drop;
I hope the Sun shines bright;
'Twill be a lovely sight."

The delicious simplicity of the last couplet is a marvel. While we are reading, the most important things in the world for us are the rustle of rain and the glint of sunlit drops, so inerrably and delicately does Mr. Davies choose his words. He is one of the poets of whom Emerson says: "They are poets by the free course which they allow to the informing Soul, which through their eyes beholds again, and blesses the things which it hath made." And not only that; Mr. Davies makes us who read bless the things he sees.

It would be hard to find poetry more contrasting with Mr. Davies' "Nature Poems" than Mr. Lawrence Binyon's "London Visions." The contrast is not only between the calm, innocent affairs of the country and the feverous tumult of the town, but between methods. Mr. Davies' simple, unhesitating song gives place to a complex poetry which uses all the resources of its art; and it is only natural that a man, who can control those resources with such easy mastery as Mr. Binyon's, should explore depths and heights unhinted at in Mr. Davies' work. When we say that Mr. Binyon has turned London into poetry, we mean that he has perceived its multitudinous activities as symbols or gestures of the unaltering human soul. No one, for instance, could read those two fine poems, "The Builders" and "The Destroyer," without seeing in a town the visible manners of spirit or will; and this faculty of re-attaching appearance to ultimate things is apparent throughout "London Visions." There is a flavor of Whitman in some of the poems, in their substance as well as in their craft, although Mr. Binyon combines his words with a more intense devotion to beauty than Whitman ever did. The metre, however, occasionally reminds one of the strong American utterance, with its roughness and grotesqueness filed away; but more often the metrical effects are as original as they are successful. This portion of Mr. Binyon's art is perhaps the most welcome to any serious lover of poetry; for it shows that there are still novel and beautiful rhythms to be extracted out of the English tongue. Here is an instance:—

"Two children, all alone and no one by,
Holding their tattered frocks, through an airy maze
Of motion, lightly threaded with nimble feet,
Dance sedately: face to face they gaze,
Their eyes shining, grave with a perfect pleasure."

We would call attention to the admirable stresses and inversions of the last two lines, so perfectly expressive of the sense. We ought to say, perhaps, that this volume of "London Visions" is a "collected and augmented" edition of two small books bearing the same title, which were published some years back. It was high time they were re-issued.

THE CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPÆDIA.*

In the strict sense of the words a Catholic Encyclopædia, like a Catholic University, is a contradiction in terms. There is no such thing as a Catholic Chemistry or a Protestant Physiology; knowledge is the same for us all. In each case, however, necessity outweighs theory. When a considerable section of the community refuses to avail itself of the educational facilities provided for and by the community at large, common sense suggests special treatment; it is better that these persons should receive a University education with a certain denominational color than that they should grow up without any University education at all. Equally, if they cannot be induced to make use of general works of reference, it is desirable that they should be supplied with others, less complete, perhaps, from our point of view, but more innocuous from theirs. This is a sufficient reason for the undertaking of which these handsome volumes are an instalment; and the prominence which they give to ecclesiastical questions, though these questions are, naturally, viewed from a sectional standpoint, may recommend them to a larger public than that to which they are specially addressed.

The majority of the writers are Americans, Dr. Driscoll, Professors Gigot, Hanna, and Oussani in particular contributing valuable matter; among European contributors may be noticed the late M. Brunetière, M. Georges Goyau, the well-known Bollandist P. de Smedt, Dr. Sauer, Mr. F. F. Urquhart of Balliol, Professor Buonaiuti, editor of the "Rivista Storico-critica," and Mgr. Benigni, a Roman prelate and journalist whose name has of late been much before the Vatican world. The workmanship, as is, perhaps, inevitable in a book on so large a scale, is unequal. Side by side with such genuinely learned and scholarly papers as those of Dr. Oussani on Assyria and Biblical Antiquities, Fr. Arendzen on Babylonia, or Drs. Dieterich and Gerland on Byzantine Literature and the Byzantine Empire, lie thin and controversial articles—e.g., Anglican Orders, by Fr. Sidney Smith, S.J.; Anglicanism, by Mgr. Moyes; or Baptism, by Fr. Fanning—which, instead of setting the facts before the reader, seem designed to tell him what he ought to think on the subjects discussed. The maps and illustrations are often admirable; but we turn from a fine reproduction of Botticelli's Magnificat, or Fra Angelico's Annunciation, to photogravures of singularly inartistic buildings in Brooklyn or Buffalo; in a "Member of French Academy in Uniform" (Vol. I., 90), we recognise the familiar features of M. Edmond Rostand; while "Missionaries Crossing River," and the "Alexian Brother" (I., 77-307), recall the immortal illustrations of "Wisdom While You Wait." The theological climate of the work varies in different parts; if it is not that of Modernism, it is certainly not, in general, that of the Encyclical "Pascendi." An official letter from Cardinal Merry del Val conveys the Pope's blessing to editors and contributors; the Archbishop of New York gives his Imprimatur; and the preface tells us that "in constituting the editors the ecclesiastical censors he has given them a singular proof of his confidence." From the fact, however, that the last published volume bears the Nihil Obstat of a censor who is neither an editor nor even, so far, a contributor, it would seem that other influences have intervened, and that a certain uneasiness is felt, if not with regard to what has been said by the contributors, at least with regard to what it is feared they may say. From the standpoint of the theology now in fashion at Rome this uneasiness is justified. The article, e.g., on Abraham, gives fairly enough the conclusions of such scholars as Gunkel and Driver, though the writer is careful to add that in stating he must not be understood to endorse them; in that on Balaam one paragraph embodies the conservative, another the critical view. Writing on Absolution, Dr. Hanna reminds us that "it is one thing to assert that the power of absolution was granted to the Church, and another to say that a full realisation of the grant was in the consciousness of the Church from the beginning." It is not easy to reconcile this teaching with that of the recent Syllabus. Nor is this a solitary example of a freer spirit than that which at present prevails in official circles. The Athanasian origin of the "Quicunque Vult" is abandoned; under the head Assumption we are told first that "the belief in the corporeal assumption of Mary is founded on the apocryphal treatise "De obitu S. Dominæ" bearing the name of St. John, which belongs, however, to the fourth or fifth century"; and a little further on that "to-day the belief in the corporeal assumption is universal," and that "according to Benedict XIV. it is a probable opinion which to deny were impious and blasphemous." At times a stronger note is sounded. The decisions of the Biblical Commission—which, it will be remembered, has pronounced in favor of the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, the traditional authorship and historical character of the Fourth Gospel, and against the composite structure of the prophecies of Isaiah—though "not infallible or unchangeable, must be received with obedience and interior assent"; the Bull "Apostolicæ Curæ," which denied the validity of Anglican Orders, "belongs to a class of ex cathedrâ utterances for which infallibility is claimed on the ground not, indeed, of the terms of the Vatican definition, but of the constant practice of the Holy See, the consentient teaching of theologians, as well as of the clearest deductions from the principles of faith."

It is not easy to see on what grounds such subjects as Bankruptcy, Artemus Ward, and the S. P. C. K. claim a specifically "Catholic" treatment. The same may be said of bull-fights; under which head we are informed that "moralists as a rule are of opinion that bull-fighting as practised in Spain is not forbidden by the natural law." In spite of these authorities, however, "the Church has often condemned bull-fighting," though "in Spain to-day these prohibitions are not in force." The historical information leaves something to be desired. The account, e.g., of Mère Angélique is misleading and inaccurate; that of Cardinal Antonelli trivial. "In extenuation of the charge that his aim was to a great extent personal aggrandisement, it must be remembered that . . . . he was not a priest, although most assiduous in the discharge of his religious duties." We will not press the inference; but it would have been better to say either less or more. Not all the historical work, however, is of this quality. Dr. Wilhelm gives a sympathetic account of the Moravian Brethren, or Unitas Fratrum, whose claim to a valid episcopal succession came before the recent Pan-Anglican Conference; Mgr. de Waal writes with authority on the Catacombs; P. Besson, S.J., on the various collections of canons, of which (under Canon Law) a more detailed study is reserved for a future volume; the article on the Bollandists, by one of their number, gives facts with regard to that famous association of scholars not easily accessible elsewhere, while, under Bishop, Professor van Hove, of Louvain, contributes a scientific treatise on the origin and status of the episcopate in which prominence is given to Lightfoot's famous "Dissertation on the Christian Ministry," and to the original research of such scholars as Duchesne and Batiffol.

Much of the good work, and there is much good work, in the various papers requires a certain reading between the lines. The reason for this is obvious; the censorship is incompatible with intellectual sincerity. The Roman Church, called upon to choose between reformation—reformation, it may be admitted, of a radical sort—and war with science, chose the latter. The policy of the Inquisition and the Index has been from the first one of isolation; had it been successful, Catholicism, like China, would have been shut off from the outer world. Catholicism, however, is too large and too complex, too intimately bound up with the fortunes of mankind, for such tactics to be more than relatively effective. It was impossible to isolate half Europe; science is an atmosphere rather than a doctrine, and could not be kept out. Hence a compromise. It was understood on the one side that, under ordinary circumstances, a certain latitude must be allowed to scholars; and, on the other, that their criticism should be brought to bear on the outworks only—the citadel was to be immune. The distinction was abstract; the logic of thought inevitable; the concordat broken down. Of late years the tendency on the part of Rome has been to have done with understandings of this sort, and to make the state of siege absolute. This temper is not that of the Encyclopædia; how, or whether, the divergence will be overcome the future will show. The suspension of the (R.C.) "New York Review" and the disquieting rumors with regard to the judgment of the Papal theologians on the Encyclopædia are characterised by a leading American weekly ("The Independent") as "the most serious blow the Catholic Church in America has ever received from Rome."

EMPERORS INTIME.*

Mr. Hodgetts has attempted for the benefit of English readers the portrayal of the Russian Imperial families, less on their political than on their private side. We are to think not of tyranny and revolution but of Grand Dukes in pantoufles, the Emperor Nicholas in the nursery. Owing to the fact that many of the characters under discussion happen to be alive the last part of the book is decorously colorless; truth, however, is allowed more freedom in the first, and Mr. Hodgetts gives us an interesting account of the Courts of Alexander and Nicholas I.

Liberal, sympathetic and humane, Alexander I. was a typical product of the romantic period. A German sentimentalist with a French education, his truly Russian instability of character made him a jumble of contending forces. His handsome face and engaging manners inspired the pens of feminine admirers; in his family he was always "the angel"—but to the more critical male mind he was something of a mystery, even a little of a mountebank. Napoleon baldly called him "skilful, false, and cunning," but Thiers shows more fineness of discernment when he says of Alexander, "There might be discerned in him traces of hereditary infirmity. His mind, lively, changeable, and susceptible, was continually impressed with the most contradictory ideas. But this remarkable Prince was not always led away by momentary impulses; he united with his extensive and versatile comprehension a profound secretiveness which baffled the closest observation. He was well-meaning and a dissembler at the same time." The Emperor, indeed, seems to have been possessed of one of those puzzling personalities which the American psychologists call "divided souls." Such temperaments are peculiarly liable to conversion, and Alexander, towards the end of his life, fell a complete captive to the influence exercised over him by Madame de Krudener—a fantastic figure who might have stepped out of one of Turgenieff's novels. When the Emperor met her she was over fifty years of age, pale, thin to emaciation, with little trace of that beauty which once had exercised a wide and singular spell. Like many another whose youth had been passed in vanity her old age was given to God; her ambition to break hearts was changed into that of saving souls. The interview with Alexander is described by M. Empaycaz:—

> "Mme. de Krudener, on hearing the approach of the Emperor, had left the village of Schluchtern with the express intention of intercepting him at Heilbronn. From the first moment of entering his presence she addressed her Sovereign in the same tone of fearless and outspoken reproof which she was accustomed to make use of towards all those who came to her for spiritual guidance. . . . The interview lasted far into the night. The Emperor was almost incapable of speech. Stirred to the very depth of his soul by the eloquent words of his visitor, he sat with his head resting on his hands shedding silent tears."

Whatever may have been her motive, the influence of Mme. de Krudener over the Emperor's private life was undoubtedly beneficial. He gave up frivolous and immoral pursuits and passed his evenings in prayer. Alexander married at an extremely early age, the Princess Louisa of Baden. A portrait of her by Monier shows us a gentle, delicate girl in a high-waisted Empire gown, and fair ringlets hanging down her cheeks. Her lips are close shut and sensitive, and her long melancholy eyelids droop as though already heavy with those tears which her ladies would so often surprise her secretly shedding over the portrait of "that Alexander who was so charming and so faithless." Married at fifteen, her husband only a year older, the childish couple loved each other, and seemed fitted for happiness. But a few months after their wedding, a serpent, in the shape of the old Empress Catherine, broke into their Eden and drove

By EDWARD PEPLE, Part Author of "Richard the Brazen."

She stood at the water's edge, a girl just budding into womanhood, her fair skin glistening with the freshness of her bath. A clinging skirt from hip to knee, revealed her slender symmetry of limb, clean, lithe, and poised for nimble flight. For the rest she was nude, save for a tumbling wealth of flame-hued locks, tossed by the rising breeze, half veiling, half disclosing, a gleaming bust and throat. Above, a witch's face, Grecian in its lines, yet dashed with the warm voluptuousness of Semitic blood; a mouth, firm, fearless in its strength, yet tempered by a reckless merriment—a mouth to harden in a tempest-gust of scorn, to quiver at the sigh of passion's prayer, or fling its light-lipped laughter in the teeth of him who prayed. Her eyes—a haunted pool of light, wherein a man might drown his soul, and, sinking, bless his torturer.
For an instant more stood Menon, gaping at the girl, till humour gripped him, and he flung back his head and laughed.
"By Asshur," he cried aloud, "a kiss shall be the price of thy sweet impertinence!"

them out for ever. Whether actuated by mere love of grandmotherly interference or by some deeper and more baneful design is uncertain, but Catherine packed off the boy-husband to join his father in a military camp, and his bride was left to pine in solitude. Alexander sought consolation in other arms; his young wife could not forgive him and their married happiness was ruined. After the death of her two infant daughters the Empress wept away all traces of her beauty, became cold and timid, fell into the background and abandoned herself to grief. At the very end of her life something like a reconciliation took place between husband and wife, but their second honeymoon was cut short quickly and tragically by the death of the Empress. Alexander followed her soon after, at the age of forty-eight.

The Emperor Nicholas, brother and successor to Alexander I., was a man of wholly different stamp. An autocrat by temperament, his German and military upbringing fostered the narrow spirit of discipline and devotion to rule which made him a respectable character and a faulty governor. As a child, however, he united a violent and passionate temper to a nervous and somewhat cowardly disposition; his teachers considered him a boy of limited intelligence, and complained of his rude and imperious manners, his frivolity, his love of joking, and absence of all seriousness. So little, sometimes, the child is father to the man. He married Charlotte of Prussia, the beautiful and cultivated daughter of Queen Louisa, and, unlike his brother Alexander, was a most faithful and devoted husband. The marriage was happy, but in later years husband and wife drifted rather apart, for the Empress cherished liberal and romantic aspirations, whilst the Emperor became increasingly despotic, unimaginative and severe. Her influence over her husband waning, all the repressed sympathies of the Empress's nature were given to her eldest son. The future Alexander II. had himself suffered too much from despotism in the household not to sympathise with his country's struggles for freedom. After her death his mother's influence bore fruits; in 1861 occurred the memorable Emancipation of the Serfs. But the end of his life dwindled down to a painful record of temperamental infirmity; a weak man is never any stronger for being in a false position. The Panslavist Alexander III. was a simple and straightforward barbarian who hated conventions, seldom washed, beat his servants, and plunged Russia back into the Middle Ages. His watchwords were "No nonsense" and "Russia for the Russians," and as his character presented no problems to the intellect he was considerably respected by the peasantry.

Mr. Hodgetts gives us a chapter on the Nihilist movement and a slight sketch of the political situation. He inclines more to scandal than to horrors, apologises for all parties, is careful to spare our feelings, and leaves us with the general feeling that when the Tsar is on his throne all is very nearly, if not quite, right with the world.

NOVELS OF THE HOUR.

Mr. George A. Birmingham's "Spanish Gold" (Methuen, 6s.) is a thing of joy. It appeals not only to the treasure-hunting instinct, alive in all properly constituted human beings, but also to the rarer and more cultivated delight in displays of character. While the incidents nearly approach the border of farce, the solid characterisation stands well within the field of comedy. Meldon, the Irish curate, so brilliantly inventive both as a liar and as a treasure hunter, is a personage new to the English reader, and well worth knowing. In him, as in the story itself, the highly fanciful web of the treasure search has a background of solid knowledge and reality. Readers of "Spanish Gold" will probably suppose themselves to have been merely amused and interested. In reality they will also have been instructed; Mr. Birmingham will have shown them in miniature, and to an accompaniment of laughter, a peep of the real Ireland.

It is impossible not to respect the industry and the courage of Mr. Robert Herrick. His novel "Together" (Macmillan, 6s.), contains over 590 closely printed pages, and his subject is of the kind that appeals to Tolstoy and to Mr. William de Morgan. It introduces, that is to say, a very large number of persons, and examines in detail the relation to one another of most of them. The love affairs of at least six American couples are presented for our consideration. At no moment does the work cease to be careful, both in conception and in execution, and at no moment can we doubt the writer's effort to be sincere. Yet the book lacks vitality, and the author's earnestness results in passages of falsetto. It is safe to guess that the portions of his story dearest to him are those describing Dr. Renault's sanatorium, and the final renunciation of Margaret and Falkner—and these are precisely the portions farthest from the plane of real life. Perhaps the qualities of "Together" can best be indicated by saying that it is precisely the book to be valued as "deep" and "searching" by cultured ladies, who live secluded from the stream of the world, and that is precisely not the book that Mr. de Morgan would have produced if he had applied his robust Victorian diffuseness, his healthy frivolity, and his flavor of cheerful British Philistinism to the same theme.

Mr. W. J. Dawson is primarily not a novelist, but a preacher. "A Soldier of the Future" (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.) is the story of an American clergyman's dream, and is no more a novel, in the ordinary sense, than "The Pilgrim's Progress" is. As reading matter, however, it is interesting, and to persons who share the author's religious beliefs no doubt very impressive. But like most sermons, it will only touch the converted. To the rest it will seem no more than a clever exercise of the imagination. The working out of the central idea is logical and sincere, and the underlying moral earnestness is pleasant to feel. One or two scenes are striking enough to linger in the memory.

The author of "Saints in Society" has somewhat improved since she wrote that successful but singularly "cheap" novel. In "The Mayoress's Wooing" (Hutchinson, 6s.), we find no such excruciating lapses from good English, though Mrs. Baillie Saunders still permits herself to write "in comparison to"; "like many burly men, silk stockings . . . gave him a sudden advantage"; and to let "whom" serve as a nominative; is still innocent of any search for the really fitting word, and sets our teeth on edge in the way that a painter might who used aniline dyes to paint with. Moreover, she has one scene so strangely and guilelessly absurd as to arouse blank amazement. Does Mrs. Baillie Saunders really think that the Borough Councillors of Marylebone care twopence about the legitimate or illegitimate birth of their aldermen? Can she possibly suppose that any Mayor of that august borough would permit an alderman elect to be publicly questioned as to his parentage, or that a refusal to reply to irrelevant personalities would lose him an election? Still, "The Mayoress's Wooing" is better than "Saints in Society." The idea of a Lady Mayoress as central figure of a novel has its piquancy; and to choose a heroine who wears pince-nez, and has been christened Sarah—with an "h"—is creditable to the boldness of any novelist. We remark, however, that the young lady doffed her eyeglasses when she went to a ball—the very occasion, one would have thought, when a short-sighted person would have needed their assistance. We live in hope of meeting a heroine who shall wear actual spectacles, and yet manage to remain attractive.

"Patsy," by Mr. H. de Vere Stacpoole (Fisher Unwin, 6s.) a thoroughly diverting, if not thoroughly credible narrative, breathes the hilarious atmosphere rendered familiar by "Reminiscences of an Irish R.M." Its hero is a small Irish boy who, being taken on as page in a well-to-do English family, at once proceeds privately to regulate the affairs of the household. He takes under his special protection a pair of young lovers, throws ingenious obstacles in the way of their various opponents, and finally arranges a successful elopement. Incidentally, the curious ethics of a small Irish community and the humors of certain pompous English people are amusingly displayed. Mr. Stacpoole's easy style, so apparently artless and really so careful, makes pleasant reading, and the rapid succession of events keeps the farce from ever flagging. "Patsy" should certainly appear on every library list during the Christmas holidays.

Illustrating the History, Arms, Art, Literature and Civilisation of Italy during the Fifteenth, Sixteenth, and Seventeenth Centuries.

By JAMES DENNISTOUN OF DENNISTOUN

Edited with Annotations and an Introduction by EDWARD HUTTON

With 100 Illustrations. Demy 8vo (3 vols.) 42s. net.

For many years this great book has been out of print, yet it still remains the chief authority for all we know of the Duchy of Urbino from the beginning of the fifteenth century, and so should surely be in the hands of every lover of Italy. For the Court of Urbino was perhaps the most splendid, the most cultured in Italy, and Duke Federigo one of the greatest soldiers of his time. Indispensable as the book is, as a matter of course the earlier portions of it, at any rate, needed some sort of revision or commentary. Mr. Edward Hutton, author of "Sigismondo Malatesta," has carefully edited the whole book, leaving the text indeed substantially the same, but adding a very large number of new notes, comments, and references, so that the book should appeal not only to the general reader (indeed, a more fascinating story was never written), but to the English student of Italian History during the period of the Renaissance. Wherever possible Mr. Hutton has sent the reader directly to the sources. Every sort of work has been laid under contribution to illustrate the text, and bibliographies have been supplied on many subjects. Thus the reader breathlessly following the marvellous career of Cesare Borgia, for instance, is able to verify or dispute every detail almost, references being given and quotations made in the notes from old and new authorities. Besides these notes and so forth, the book acquires a new value on account of the wealth of illustrations which it now contains, so that a pictorial comment has been added to a historical and critical one.

This work is compiled from diaries and letters dating from the time of the Regency to the middle of the nineteenth century. The value of the work lies in its natural unembellished picture of the life of a cultured and well-born family in a foreign environment at a period so close to our own that it is far less familiar than periods much more remote. There is an atmosphere of Jane Austen's novels about the lives of Admiral Knox and his family, and a large number of well-known contemporaries are introduced into Mrs. Blake's pages. Diary of the Week.

The Prime Minister announced on Thursday night that the Government were able, on the strength of the negotiations conducted, on the one hand, with a group of leading Nonconformists, and, on the other hand, with the Primate and some Bishops, to introduce a new Education Bill next week. As to the basis of this new departure, neither the Nonconformist Committee nor the Primate were able to bind their following. But they had given the Government an assurance that they would "ex animo acquiesce" in the new settlement subject to debate on some "not unimportant" points of detail.

The commanding features of the compromise have already been stated in The Nation. They include a general transference of all schools to the public authority, subject to a small area of contracting-out for Catholic and some High Church schools. These establishments would be deprived of rate aid, but would obtain terms better than the 47s. grant provided in the McKenna Bill. The standard of religious instruction is to be Cowper-Templeism, but a right of entry for denominational teaching given either (a) by a minister of religion, (b) by existing head teachers in voluntary schools, or (c) by a volunteer assistant teacher, and paid for by the denomination, is to be permitted during school hours on two mornings in the week. The right of entry will be statutory, and not subject to local option. All denominational managers will disappear, and the teachers will all be appointed by the local authority and be free from religious tests. We understand that the Nonconformist Committee, which includes Dr. Clifford, Mr. Scott Lidgett, Mr. Massie, and Sir George White, are prepared generally to support this settlement. Mr. Hirst Hollowell and the Primitive Methodist Connection are unfriendly. On the Church side the two Archbishops and, we believe, nearly all the Bishops, with the exception of Dr. Gore, are supporters, while Lord Hugh Cecil and High and Low Church extremists are irreconcileable, and are impudently canvassing vicars against the Primate. "The Guardian" supports the right of entry, but hints that it must carry the abolition of Cowper-Templeism. Mr. Balfour's attitude is indecisive, but probably he will not obstruct a settlement, especially if the Lords destroy the Licensing Bill.

The Committee of Liberal Members of Parliament who specially interest themselves in the reduction of armaments have sought an interview with the Prime Minister on the subject of his answer to Mr. Arthur Lee on the interpretation of the two-Power standard. The interview was first fixed for Thursday, and has now been postponed till Tuesday. There is reason to believe that the Government do not accept the view of a change or extension of the Prime Minister's declaration on March 2nd of this year, or of the late Prime Minister's statement in 1907. The point would seem to be whether America, which now comes within the category of the two next strongest Powers, is or is not to be counted in, and whether we are also to reckon together Powers which are actually in opposite groups or even alliances. The further question would seem to arise whether France is or is not in actual alliance with us. We are informed that the Government are disposed to give reassuring declarations to the party, and that the new statement will not affect the Naval Estimates for next year.

Mr. Balfour made a rollicking party speech at Cardiff on Thursday, in which, while claiming sympathy and kinship with the Government's foreign policy, and pinning down the Prime Minister to an acceptance of the Cawdor interpretation of the two-Power standard—"namely, an equality of strength with any two other Powers, with the necessary margin"—he called also for a large home army. On domestic affairs he let himself go. The Government had a Gargantuan appetite for legislation, though they were "rather coarse feeders." On education they had just introduced a new Bill—their fourth—which was in charge of their third Minister of Education. The Bill would have as respectful a consideration as it deserved. On the Licensing question, he boldly denied that the restriction of facilities for drinking produced any moral result. In any case, the plan of the Bill in cutting down public-houses and leaving club-drinking practically untouched was a piece of "immoral folly." He hinted that the Lords were perfectly safe from popular indignation whatever they did about licensing—as safe as the Irish cattle-drivers. On Protection he was still vague, but he admitted the Protectionist basis of "looking after the producer," and spoke of Tariff Reform as the dawn of the new era to which his party would give shape.

Sir Edward Grey spoke with sense and wisdom on foreign affairs at Scarborough on Thursday night. The only point on which Liberals will be inclined to criticise him is in the stress he lays on the value of continuity in foreign policy, based on understandings and alliances with Continental Powers. The old policy, says Sir Edward Grey, was called "isolation" at home, while foreign Powers called it "unreliability." But is the partial and necessary isolation of an island Power "unreliable"? On German relations he was moderate and reassuring. The constitutional debates in the Reichstag had not revealed one word of hostility to Great Britain from any German party. Such language should be reflected in our criticisms of German politics. Outsiders were over-prone to find subtle motives in diplomacy, the fact being that Foreign Offices were simpler than they looked, and often lived from hand to mouth. Our own naval power was purely defensive, and was based on the necessity of meeting "any probable combination which might be brought to bear upon us,"—a reversion, we are glad to see, to the more moderate and reasonable view of the two-Power standard. On the Near East, Sir Edward Grey emphasised his warm and very fruitful sympathy for the new Turkish movement. Our own old attitude to the Turkish Government was one of "despair," but now "every good force" in the country had sprung into activity. If the Conference was held, Turkey would now meet from Europe general "sympathy and fair play."

A meeting of Conservative peers at Lansdowne House has been summoned for Tuesday to decide the fate of the Licensing Bill. The alternatives are rejection on second reading, and drastic amendment, including the elimination of the time-limit. The "Telegraph" thinks that the first course will be chosen. Lord Rothschild is said to have secured 169 signatures for his round robin in favor of rejection. Lord St. Aldwyn is reported to favor the milder course, but his counsels rarely carry the majority of the Peers, and it is thought that both Lord Lansdowne and Mr. Balfour will accept, even if they do not urge, the destruction of the Bill. Its fate will be determined before that of the educational compromise is exactly known, but an educational success would spell certain failure for it.

On Saturday the Chinese Emperor died, and on Sunday the Dowager Empress. The Emperor, Kwang Su, had been on the throne since 1875, but his only attempt at ruling, in 1898, when he poured out a torrent of ill-digested reforms, was very quickly put an end to by the Dowager Empress. The Dowager Empress, Tse-Hsi, one of the most remarkable women rulers in the history of the world, was born in 1834, and governed China from 1861, during a most troublous period. Though often credited with reactionary tendencies, she was rather notable for her keen perception of practical possibilities, and it is significant that she took up and shaped many of the reforms which Kwang Su proclaimed in their full crudity. A new Emperor, Pu-Yi, an infant, has been appointed, under the regency of his father, Prince Chun, who has had European experience. Complete order reigns in Pekin, and the fullest satisfaction is felt with the arrangements. Yuan-Shi-Kai is responsible for everything that has been done; he has ten thousand trained troops in Pekin, and is the real power behind the throne. The valedictory edicts of the late Emperor and Dowager Empress insist upon the continuance of preparations for constitutional government to be introduced as previously ordained within the next nine years, and with Yuan-Shi-Kai in control the progressive cause is in safe hands.

On Tuesday Prince Bülow, fortified by the unanimous approval of the Prussian Ministry and the Federal Council, had audience of the Kaiser, as a result of which the Kaiser announced that "he realised that his highest Imperial duty was to maintain the stability of the policy of the Empire by observing the constitutional responsibilities and that, therefore, he approved the declarations of the Chancellor in the Reichstag." The Kaiser's statement manifestly means two things, that Prince Bülow is to remain in office, and that the Kaiser confesses error in the past and promises amendment in the future. How much more it means depends largely upon what the Kaiser understands by constitutional responsibilities. The judgment of the Press is divided. The Conservatives, of course, are thoroughly satisfied; the "Kölnische Zeitung," the national Liberal organ, finds the solution happy and adequate to the immediate occasion. The "Berliner Tageblatt" agrees with the "Vorwärts" in discovering that the Reichstag lies quite outside the solution, and that what has happened is an increase in the influence of the Chancellor, but no corresponding increase in the influence of the Reichstag. The phrase "constitutional responsibilities" in the Kaiser's mouth has no reference to responsibility to the elected representatives of the nation.

The advanced Radicals want guarantees in the form of constitutional amendment which shall give the Reichstag a share in the choice and dismissal of the Chancellor, and the Socialists have already tabled proposals to that effect. There is not the slightest chance of these proposals coming to anything now, for when the "Kölnische Zeitung" says that "the great majority of the nation is strongly Monarchist, and would have liked nothing better than to follow confidently the Kaiser's lead," it is telling the literal truth. The German people are not prepared yet for Ministerial responsibility in our sense, but though the present crisis will pass away without formal changes in the Constitution, it would be a mistake to conclude that it will have left no mark. Both the Socialists and many Radicals miss the moral of our Constitution when they ignore the fact that with us Ministerial responsibility is an unwritten convention, based upon the sentiment of the English Parliament and the English nation. The "Frankfurter Zeitung," with its usual perspicacity, appreciates this, and says that what is most necessary is a psychological change in people and Reichstag, a sentiment of independence and a hatred of Byzantinism. The present crisis is notable as marking a stage in the development of this new psychology, and its educational value will persist and bear fruit, though no formal guarantees crystallise out of it.

Dr. Lang, Bishop Suffragan of Stepney, has been appointed Archbishop of York in succession to Dr. Maclagan. Dr. Lang is forty-four years old. His chief parochial work has been done at Leeds and at Portsea, where his organisation was novel and brilliant, and his preaching at St. Paul's has been eloquent, though untouched by the distinction and feeling of Liddon. He is a High Churchman, was a strong Conservative at Oxford, and his success in working Mr. Balfour's Act in the interests of the ex-voluntary schools gave him a great reputation among the Anglican stalwarts on Education. On the other hand, he has co-operated with Dr. Davidson in bringing about the compromise of the education quarrel. He has talent and energy, but his gifts of intellect do not compare with those of more than one Bishop on the Bench, and his appointment weakens, we fear, the strain of liberalism in Church government.

The King and Queen of Sweden have returned King Edward's visit to Stockholm of last spring, and were received with great warmth by the King and the people of London. The cordiality of the reception will, we hope, do away with the earlier feeling in Sweden that we accepted too readily Norway's case for separation, and did too little justice to the remarkable unselfishness and restraint with which King Oscar and Sweden bore the loss of sovereignty. Both at Windsor and the Guildhall, King Gustavus spoke of the two countries' common enjoyment of liberal institutions and of their close friendship—a friendship now cemented by the guarantee of the North Sea agreement.

The New Zealand elections have returned the Liberals to power for the seventh time in succession, though on this occasion with a diminished majority and with the defeat of one Minister. These elections were of interest for two reasons—for the first time the second ballot had come into operation, and for the first time the Liberal-Labor combination,which the late Mr. Seddon welded together, had openly begun to break up. Sir Joseph Ward is less Radical than his predecessor, and, on the other hand, the Labor men have become more insistent and restless. The Second Ballot Act was passed last Session to meet precisely this danger of the reactionary Opposition prospering from the divisions among the Progressive forces. The fact that twenty-one second ballots will have to be taken has justified this precaution. One notable result of the elections lying outside ordinary party politics is the growth of the temperance vote. Six more districts voted prohibition, and many others a reduction of licences, so that 148 public-houses will be closed. The prospect of prohibition ruling throughout New Zealand becomes quite considerable when it is defeated in cities like Auckland and Dunedin by narrow majorities. That the woman's vote is a considerable element in the progress of temperance is generally admitted.

The Budget report on the French army points out that the annual military expenditure of the six Powers with the strongest armies amounts to over £200,000,000, and the total number of men they can put into the field to 31,700,000. These estimates are steadily rising, that of France, for instance, standing now at £29½ millions, and that of Germany at £42¾ millions. The German forces with the colors are 34,118 officers and 602,670 men, as against 27,310 French officers and 511,939 men. The French soldier, it will be seen, is cheaper per man than the German, but what concerns French military men most is the disparity in the size of the contingents, a disparity which, with the falling French birth-rate and the increasing German population, must grow. The reporter of the French Budget suggests as compensations the increasing of the volunteer permanent professional force and the recruiting of native soldiers. The first of these devices would be very expensive, and opinion is much exercised as to the wisdom of applying conscription to Algeria. The Arab tribesmen offer a large reservoir of soldiers, but they dislike conscription, and the peril of training them to arms—even when most of them are kept on service in France—is obvious.

The scheme for the supply of electricity in bulk to London, known as the London and District Electricity Supply Bill, has been unanimously rejected by the Select Committee, which finds that the preamble was not proved. The financial backing of the scheme was always speculative, and presumably it is this weakness which has wrecked it in spite of its purchase clause. There is, unfortunately, no probability that the London County Council are either willing or able to organise a municipal supply. The Government will now have to seek the co-operation of a large number of authorities without which no scheme can go through.

While public attention is concentrated on Parliament, the great engines of government, the permanent departments, work quietly on. It is only rarely that the average man gets a glimpse of the power they exercise independently of, and, at times, even in opposition to, the wishes of the people's representatives. An instance of the manner in which a reactionary department may increase the difficulties in the way of social reform is seen in a recent letter and Order which has been received by the Poplar Guardians from the Local Government Board. As though blind to the way in which the poverty for which all London should be responsible is concentrated in this poorest borough of the East End, the Board call attention to the large amount of Poor Law relief in Poplar, and animadvert on the scale of relief allowed to the wives of men who have been relieved under the "Modified Workhouse Test Order," by which, for some time, the Poor Law has been somewhat humanised, by permitting the husband alone to enter the workhouse, while his wife and family receive out-relief and keep together the home.

The Local Government Board's new order now limits the duration of this test to eight weeks in each year, after which the whole family must come into the workhouse, or starve. The cruelty of the modification, which is thus made on the authority of the Department alone, might raise a protest from the Charity Organisation Society itself. Unless the Local Government Board modifies its position, a number of men already working under this test will be turned out before Christmas, and their homes broken up, although the Distress Committee cannot provide work for all the men on its lists who have been passed as suitable, and although the Borough Council has declared itself unable to afford the expense of any relief works. The scale of allowance to which the Board objects is: 10s. for the wife, 2s. for the first child, 1s. 6d. for the second, and 1s. each for every additional child. Out of this sum there is the rent to be paid, and in Poplar rents are high, so that it is difficult to see how the wife and children can find much margin to spend in riotous living. It is to be hoped that the attention of Parliament will be called to an interpretation of the Poor Law more in harmony with the ideas of the reformers of 1832 than the principles which must mark the new Poor Law of 1909.

A TEST CASE FOR THE LORDS.

Laid up, not in the heavens, but in the sublime minds of hereditary legislators, there exists an ideal of an Upper House, which plays a noble part in our turbulent democracy. Raised above the turmoil of the hustings, manned by those whose position places them above all sordid calculations of interest, trained by long tradition to regard all public issues with a single eye to the public interest, responsible not to the people, but to conscience, to high tradition, and to the ideal of a nobility, this Chamber exercises, with the impartiality and restraint of a court of justice, the ultimate arbitrament upon all legislative proposals. Its part is to resist the blind passions of the mob, to save the country from itself, to guard it from the consequences of an impulsive vote which places executive power for a term of years in the hands of a group of partisan leaders. It stands for the ideal against the material, for the permanent welfare of the nation against the lower interests and more ancient impulses that appeal to a mob, for the sense of duty in public life against the expediency of the Moment and the desires of the Mass.

For such an ideal no better test could be devised than the question of the liquor traffic. Here is an issue where all the impulses of the mob are on one side, and all the convictions of men who seriously regard the welfare of the people on the other, where all that is most elementary in human nature craves unrestricted liberty, and all that is best sees the need of discipline and control. Here, if anywhere, is an issue over which the most ardent believers in democracy might shake their heads. Here is a point at which, they must admit, the ideal of self-government is most sorely tried. It is possible, they might well say, to appeal intelligently to the self-interest of the masses, and in many matters to their sense of patriotism, of duty, and of humanity as well. But to ask them to control themselves at their weakest point, to accept close restrictions and restraint upon the luxury which habit has made their chief resource, is to ask no small matter. Here, if anywhere, they might doubt the efficacy of self-government, and might appeal to the "governing class" and the body which represents it to throw the whole weight of their influence on the side of reform. Yet, notwithstanding all difficulties, in the face of unexampled clamor, and fearlessly discounting the loss of bye-elections, a democratic Parliament has at length succeeded in bringing to completion a scheme for resuming the full public control of the liquor traffic. In carrying the Bill through the House of Commons concessions have been made. Something has been sacrificed to secure the passage of the measure as a whole. It might be thought that the Lords, acting in that spirit of trusteeship which we have endeavoured to describe, would remove these concessions, would seek to strengthen the original Bill, would, in a word, throw all their weight on the side of public order and national discipline. Such would be the natural inference from the account which defenders of the Peers give of them, an account which alone can justify their constitutional position.

Such is the expectation which an innocent visitor from another country might form. But what are the facts? The ultimate decision is not yet known. But we are told in the first place that a great financier has canvassed the peerage and formed a list of some 140 trustees of the public welfare who are prepared, not to amend or discuss the Bill in detail, but to reject it on a second reading. It is not even suggested that the movement proceeds in the first instance from the regular party leaders, who have at least had some experience in governing the country. Still less is it conceived in the interest of any alternative scheme of temperance reform. It is fathered by a financier and conceived in the interests of finance. It is simply a move, avowed and unashamed, in the great game of wealth against commonwealth. Dramatically in conflict as it is with every tradition which might be held to justify the position of the Upper House, it is being freely said that this movement will prevail with the Unionist leaders who guide the counsels of the Peers. It is thought that, in spite of all that Mr. Balfour himself has admitted in favor of details of regulation contained in the Bill, the Lords will contemptuously annul the main work of the Commons for a year. Yet, in associating themselves with the financiers, the Unionist leaders can no longer take the high moral line. The attempt to represent the Bill as a measure of confiscation, ridiculous from the first to anyone who knew his case, ridiculous in the eyes of all men since the Bill was supported by the Bishops, has been definitely broken down by Mr. Balfour's admission. Mr. Balfour himself denies that the licence is a freehold, and, meeting his dialectical match for once in Mr. Herbert Samuel, he was driven to the position that the only question of property involved in the time limit is a question of amount of compensation and length of time, a question not of principle but of degree. That the licence is a taxable source of wealth which the State can control will, in fact, be shown in the most palpable manner in the next Budget should the Lords decide to reject the Bill. The terms they are now offered are financially generous rather than just, and though if the Bill is lost the power of controlling the British traffic in the public interest goes with it, the power of taxation remains and will be exercised with no time limit and with a single eye to the public interest.

But for our part we do not yet despair of the intelligence of the Peers. There will be some strong pleaders for the Bill among them, and they have a strong case. It is true that by destroying the Bill the Lords may gain some temporary popularity with a certain class, and some immediate addition to their prestige. But a constitutional power that rests on the drink habit is insecurely founded. By acting for the brewer and the financier, the Lords will shake the confidence of a class of men far more necessary in the long run to their own security. They exist and retain their power partly because everyone agrees to the necessity of some method of securing revision, because they are in possession, and because the democratic parties have not agreed upon an alternative. But the condition of their existence is that they should not alienate the large number of serious, public-spirited men who, without being either Liberals or Socialists, perhaps without being party politicians at all, want to see England sober, well ordered, and prosperous. Such men have often a distrust of democracy, and shrink from advanced ideas. They fear the "mob" and its ways. They are nervous about the stability of the social order, and often oppose Liberal Governments from dread of violent change. They are the moral support of the House of Lords, in which they think they see a guarantee against the rash experiments which they fear. These men up and down the country are supporting the Licensing Bill. They know it for a moderate measure. They admire the Government for its courage in introducing and standing by it. They have weighed the costs of drink and know the need of a remedy. Many of them, perhaps, believe that reform in this direction, a great moral reform, is the true alternative to Socialism. These are the men whom the Lords, if they throw out the Bill, will range on our side. These are the men to whom they will reveal the secret of their position, that it is wealth, and the power and the social callousness of wealth, that they represent. These are the men whom they will force to look elsewhere for whatever counterpoise to democracy they need, and whom they will convince that if England is to free herself from the incubus that retards her progress among the nations, she must first free herself from the Chamber in which are focussed all the powers of conscienceless wealth.

THE NEW DEFINITION OF NAVAL POWER.

The Prime Minister will not, we think, complain that a large body of Liberal members of Parliament should ask him to explain the reasons of the theory of naval strength to which he appears to have committed himself in his reply to Mr. Arthur Lee. Mr. Lee, it will be remembered, asked the Government whether it accepted the two-Power standard as meaning our preponderance in capital ships over the two next strongest naval Powers. Mr. Asquith replied in the affirmative. The meaning which Mr. Lee attached to his formula is not open to question. In the debate in March last on Mr. Murray Macdonald's motion, he insisted that our shipbuilding must have regard simply to the material strength of other Powers on the ground that "every Power, however friendly for the moment, must be reckoned as a potential enemy." Hitherto, however, it has not been the practice of Liberal Ministers to rely on purely arithmetical calculations of strength. Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman refused to do so in 1907, when he declared that it would be absurd for us to build against strong naval Powers with which we were in alliance. Mr. Asquith took the same line when, in March of this year, he declared as Chancellor of the Exchequer that "the standard we have to maintain is one which would give us complete and absolute command of the sea against any reasonably possible combination of Powers." And, a few days later, Lord Tweedmouth, then First Lord of the Admiralty, was presented by Lord Cawdor with this same notion of building against the two strongest Powers, and rejected it. He preferred, he said, to base the two-Power standard on "any reasonable and probable combination." The same language, we observe, was used on Thursday night by Sir Edward Grey.

Here, therefore, would seem to be a real distinction of policy, based on a different interpretation of facts. For example, the old Bannerman-Asquith formula would certainly exclude a German-American combination. The Cawdor-Lee formula must as certainly include it. The earlier Liberal reading of the two-Power standard would not call upon us to build against Japan and France in combination, or Germany and France, or Japan and Germany, in union. In fact, and in view of the course of European politics as modified both by Liberal and Conservative statesmanship, it would merely bind us to keep well ahead of the German navy and of any inferior naval Power, such as Austria or Italy, which might be drawn by her into an anti-British alliance. Such a course was measurable, fairly definable, and consistent with some degree of success for the great Liberal aim of a common reduction of armaments. On the other hand, the Lee formula binds this country not merely to an absurd mental re-arrangement of the map of world-power, but to a boundless extravagance in armaments, in which we must always have an enormous lead, thus forcing the pace for ourselves and exposing every British tender of disarmament to an overwhelming retort, while we commit our people to a practical doubling of the sea-power of the richest and most formidable nation in the world, with a population twice as large as our own. In a word, this unhappy form of words, first framed to meet a not impossible, or even improbable, union of France and Russia, is now being used to pile burdens on our shoulders and those of our neighbors at a time when the disposition of those Powers towards us has completely altered, and when a new European situation, incomparably more favorable to ourselves, has arisen in its stead. It is even employed to drag us into competition with America, when the diplomacy of the two countries has completely altered the disposition of the British fleets, when we profess to have ruled America out of the possible range of war, and when, as we know, American shipbuilding, serious as it is, does not carry even a remote reference to ourselves.

It seems necessary, therefore, to ask for explanations, and we hope they will be forthcoming. We are not thinking alone of the shipbuilding programme for this and the coming year. That, indeed, must undergo extension if the hardening of the formula of the two-Power standard is more than a verbal slip. But the whole political position seems to us to have had a disquieting shift. The common calculation in the "Naval Annual" of anti-British strengths is precisely that combination of Germany and the United States to which the Prime Minister's adoption of the Lee formula, on the face of it, seems to apply. For this year America stepped into the position of second Naval Power, with Germany close behind, and likely to overtake her. Against the two fleets the authorities now assure us that we have a superiority of three "capital" or battle ships. But three years hence we shall be slightly behind these "two next strongest Powers." Are we, or are we not, to add these two Powers together, one of which is probably building against the other? And supposing they construct seven "Dreadnoughts," and complements, are we, irrespective of the political aims of these Powers, and of their relations to us, to lay down eight or nine?

The Government which has to answer this not unimportant question may be a Conservative or a Liberal Administration. If it is Conservative, its answer is not doubtful; if it is Liberal, the pressure from naval and Conservative sources to fulfil the letter of Mr. Asquith's declaration will be tremendous. Under the earlier interpretation of the two-Power standard, we could always put something to the credit of diplomacy, and the moral force and the wisdom of our statesmanship could be relied on to have an immediate reaction on armaments, and therefore on taxation. But if only the arithmetical table avails, and the strength of British fleets depends on the doing of a sum in simple addition, diplomacy merely plays a set of meaningless games, while reality rests alone with the hammers of our shipwrights and the incessant call of our tax-gatherers. Even on this ground the calculation seems to us a thoughtless and shallow affair. What are "capital" ships? And how can these vessels, when they are duly tabulated, be pitted against each other in these rigid mathematical proportions? What "percentage" are we to set aside for character, discipline, seamanship, engineering, gunnery, the disposition, availability, and handling of ships, the skill of admirals and officers, the character of a conflict, the spirit in which one nation or another enters upon it, its material resources and financial reserves? The old formula, in its "rough and ready" shape, was a poor enough equivalent for the many moral or semi-moral calculations that enter into warfare. What does this new turn of words represent more than the exaggerated fears and the political ignorance and scepticism of our "experts"? Was it even presented to the Government with any sincerity of aim? We doubt it. Certainly its reaction on the political situation, the value to the Protectionist Party of having a Liberal formula as to the Navy which may be used to cover a recourse to duties on foreign goods, is clear enough. The "Daily Chronicle" talks lightly of a twenty millions deficit next year as a consequence of an addition of five or six millions to the naval budget. How is Mr. Lloyd George to find this sum in a single year? He may answer with justice that he will go to the classes who have demanded a larger Navy. A Protectionist Chancellor will have no such recourse; he will bind his burdens on the mass of the people, and we are afraid he will find his excuses in the formula to which apparent, but not, we hope, substantial assent was given on Thursday week.

THE SUCCESS OF HIGH LICENCES.

We hope that the Liberal Party, while neglecting no chance of seeing a reasonable Licensing Bill through both Houses of Parliament, will keep a steady eye on the powers of dealing with the licensing question which the defeat of the measure will leave it. If the Bill goes, the time limit goes, and the regulative methods, to which even Mr. Balfour has at times given tepid approval, go with it. The country will also lose the scheme for the immediate reduction of licences. But that is the part of the Bill whose disappearance we shall witness with the most composure. For there can be no question at all that the country possesses at call a far more sure, more scientific, more simple, and, we think, more equitable method of securing a large reduction in the number of licensed houses. For this purpose it is not necessary to set up any elaborate system of trade insurance. We are not called upon to wait. We are not required to deal harshly with "the trade." We have simply to put into operation the economic remedy—namely, to exact a fair price for the granting of a monopoly in the sale of liquor. In other words, we have to discover the true taxable capacity of the liquor trade.

Such a task is long overdue. To-day our licence duties remain on the scale which Mr. Gladstone introduced in 1880. We suppose that no one to-day would defend it. It is absurdly inadequate. It is full of anomalies. The cost of a seven-day public-house licence is less than ten per cent. of the ratable value of the premises in London, and more than forty per cent. in the rural districts. Under its capricious sway, licensed houses may pay anything from one to sixty per cent. of their ratable value, while vast palaces like the Savoy and the Piccadilly Hotels, where hundreds of thousands of pounds' worth of liquor are sold every year, and whose existence Mr. Gladstone never dreamt of, share with the country inn the payment of £20 for a specially easy trade permit. There is, indeed, hardly a single feature of the 1880 plan of taxation which holds. The fixing of the limit of graduation at houses of the value of £700, stamps it with obsoleteness, and its taxation of restaurants, theatres, railway refreshment rooms, is equally indefensible. The basis of value which it assumes, namely, rental, is unfair to the public, and the extension of the tied-house system has made it doubly unreal. Its anomalies have been compendiously stated by Mr. J. E. Allen in the following comparison:—

10 houses rated at £160 pay £300.
1 house rated at £1,600 pays £60.

But the real objection to the present scale of licence duties lies in the fact that while the community, by its action in cutting down the number of licences, has greatly added to the value of the liquor monopoly, it has left the trade to reap practically the whole advantage. "Since 1880," say Messrs. Rowntree and Sherwell, in the new edition of their invaluable book, "The Taxation of the Liquor Trade," "chiefly as the result of public action, the number of public houses in the United Kingdom has declined by no fewer than 7,234, although the population has increased in the same period by nine millions, and the national expenditure upon alcohol by more than £21,000,000. Under these circumstances the possession of a licence is necessarily a much more lucrative privilege than it was a quarter of a century ago; yet not only has there been no increase in the scale of taxation, but the aggregate proceeds of the licence duties, though somewhat higher, owing to the enhancement of values, than in 1881, are actually less in proportion to population than they were twenty-eight years ago."*

The consequences of this gift of the nation to the trade cannot, we think, any longer be ignored. The policy of high, or, as they should be called, just, licence duties has been tried all over the Anglo-Saxon world, and more especially in the United States, and everywhere with success. In the States it has, to some extent, superseded prohibition, and if Messrs. Rowntree's and Sherwell's exhaustive investigations have any truth, it has never failed either to secure a great reduction of licences or to add materially to the public revenues. In a word, the American people is to-day getting back a proportion of what it gives; while we, during the past generation or so, have been giving without getting. Take, for example, the operation of the Brooks and Raines laws in Philadelphia and New York. Both set up a system of high licences in vast urban areas comparable to the greatest of our own cities. In the case of Philadelphia, the effect of the Brooks law, which raised the licence duty from £15 a year to £105, in conjunction with regulative measures, was to reduce the number of licences from 5,773 to 1,746. The law first took effect in 1887; by 1902 the licences per 1,000 of the population had fallen from 5·85 to 1·29. Yet the revenues from licence duties had greatly increased. In 1887, before the tax was felt, they stood at £86,000. Next year, with 4,433 fewer saloons, they rose to £140,000. By 1902 they had reached £390,000. The same story applies to nearly all the great centres of American population. The effect of the Raines law in New York State, which raised the old licence taxes from 150 to 300 per cent., was to reduce the number of licences from eleven per cent. in New York to twenty-five in Albany, while the State Commissioner estimated that, in 1902, it had raised the liquor revenue by £1,856,910, or nearly 300 per cent. Clearly, therefore, the taxable capacity of the trade had not been exhausted even under a law which, at one stroke, raised the maximum licence tax imposed in New York City from £50 to £160.

Our own Chancellor of the Exchequer may well envy American administrators the establishment and growth of such a fund as this. To-day in New York, the publicans' licence duties alone bring in nearly two and a-quarter million sterling. In London, with a million more people, they realise a paltry £200,000. The comparison is not less effective on a wider range. The average rate of licence duty in the cities of the United States is more than five times such duty in the United Kingdom. The contrast in the gross returns is equally striking. The total proceeds of the publicans' licence duties in the 164 British towns which have a population of 30,000 people and upwards are a little over £800,000. There are only 122 such towns in the United States, and they contain over two million fewer people. Yet the yield of the publicans' licences in these American centres is about 7½ millions sterling. If in these centres we received, for every thousand of the population, the same share of monopoly value as American citizens retain, our licence revenue alone would be over seven and three-quarter millions. No doubt when we come to the question of the relative capacity of the American and the British liquor trade, we must take into consideration the rather higher level of wine, beer, and spirit duties in this country. But making full allowance for this excess, Messrs. Rowntree and Sherwell estimate that if our trade were taxed on the American scale, our revenues would realise an increase of at least seven and a-quarter millions. Their general conclusion, worked out with the utmost care and with great fairness, is that the liquor trade in the United Kingdom is under-taxed to the extent of seven to thirteen millions a year. These may seem large sums, but we have to keep continually in mind the fact, of which both the Bill of 1904 and that of 1908 is a monument, that the liquor trade is no ordinary business but a monopoly. Messrs. Rowntree and Sherwell suggest that the State, which has created and even enhanced it, has very imperfectly appreciated its monetary value. The American statesman and reformer has firmly grasped this fact, and though the Licensing Bill may be shattered to pieces, we do well to remember that the State has another weapon at hand, whose power to do justice cannot be gainsaid.

FIRST STEPS TO CONSTITUTIONALISM.

Dr. Johnson, returning from a dull and uncontentious interview with George the Third, defined the place of Kings in human affairs with a wise simplicity, "A man cannot well be in a passion with his sovereign." The conversation of kings should be sedative, their speeches anodyne. It is this commonplace of statecraft which the German people has been engaged during the past fortnight in impressing on the Kaiser. His conversation had the unlucky effect of throwing all Germany, and at times all Europe, into a passion. Henceforward the dulness which has become habitual to other Crowned Heads is imposed on the one personality which had survived the etiquette of Courts. So much has been lost or gained by the Kaiser crisis. After those two days during which the Reichstag directed the heavy artillery of its criticisms at its sovereign, there will be no more flamboyant speeches, no more rash telegrams, no further journalistic escapades, and the Kaiser, like all his less brilliant contemporaries, will observe a "due restraint" even in his private conversations. From the standpoint of the responsible conduct of affairs even this minimum means much. The prominence of William II. on the public stage, his picturesque and irrepressible personality, had undoubtedly done something to damage the prestige of German statecraft abroad. The world at large had almost come to believe in the maxim which the Kaiser himself inscribed in the Golden Book of Nuremberg, "Regis voluntas suprema lex." It saw behind every move in the Bismarckian game this very human figure, and it distrusted the stability of German policy because this figure was so evidently emotional and even mercurial. If for a few years the Kaiser is content to wear "Ministerial clothing" with a good grace, it is quite likely that this too eager scrutiny of the personal factor in German diplomacy may become less habitual than it is to-day. Its retirement into a semi-constitutional privacy will strengthen German diplomacy, make for continuity, and avert many a superfluous controversy.

Prince Bülow has managed the affair with all his usual cleverness. There was a relatively trivial issue at stake, and there was a fundamental issue. He has contrived, by adopting up to a certain point an apparently constitutional attitude, to concentrate the dispute on the minor controversy. German opinion was annoyed by the want of restraint in the Kaiser's utterances. Prince Bülow cautiously identified himself with these criticisms, admitted their substantial justice, and with a certain dramatic display, went to Potsdam to obtain an assurance for the future. In a guarded form the assurance was duly forthcoming. Prince Bülow kept his post, and the crisis is at an end. Yet it is hardly reading too much into the Reichstag speeches, to say that even the orators of the Imperialistic parties intended something more than this. They were protesting not so much against the Kaiser's habits of speech as against the whole system of personal government. The Centre and the Socialists, who have a majority in the country, though not in the House, even tabled some drastic amendments to the Constitution. That issue Prince Bülow has quietly ignored. It was raised a year ago, when the whole Reichstag protested against "personal rule." Prince Bülow then denied the possibility of real Parliamentary government in Germany. He is doubtless of the same opinion to-day. Nor could a man of his temperament and origin well adopt a different attitude. He is, like all his predecessors, save one, a diplomatist by training and career. His art is not so much to lead as to manage men. Identified with no party, pledged to no principles, apparently without any real interest in domestic affairs, he watches the play of groups in the Reichstag, as a diplomatist watches the shifting sympathies and antipathies of States and peoples. He remains outside the game, bargaining now with this group that has its queer half-comprehended principle, now with that party, which has its obvious price in the shape of an interest to foster or protect, but steadily pursuing through the maze of barter his single ideal of a great foreign and colonial policy. This art of bureaucratic management is not confined to the Reichstag. It thrives in every State of the Empire; it is cultivated even in the cities, where an official mayor presides over elected councillors. It is essentially the modern German system. It will not be modified by such a man as Prince Bülow, who carries detachment and artifice to an unprecedented extreme. The only Chancellor who could have changed it was Bismarck, for Bismarck, great as an official, had raised himself by his personal ascendency to the position of a popular leader, almost, indeed, to that of a party chief.

To strengthen the Chancellor's hands in restraining the vagaries of the Monarch is not, as yet, to advance the Constitutional position beyond a quite elementary stage. Against an overt and public indiscretion the Chancellor can now appeal to an alert and rather jealous Reichstag. But in the far more important task of grappling at close quarters and in private with the personal factor, the Chancellor is still comparatively powerless. All the busy world of intrigue which the Hohenlohe memoirs revealed to us, is left untouched by the crisis of this week. In his private intercourse with the Court and the Monarch, the Chancellor is still merely an official among officials, a courtier among courtiers. He has behind him no organised and permanent force of public opinion. He is not a party chief, and, above all, he is denied the weapon of opposition. If he is flouted and over-ridden, he cannot "go to the country," or thunder at his successor from the other side of the House. If he is dismissed, another will take his office, and he himself can look forward only to the academic revenge of launching from his retirement an occasional indiscretion.

Apart from the tradional discipline and docility of the German people, there are two main reasons why their evolution towards true Parliamentary government is likely to be exceedingly slow. The first of them is the fact that the main business of the Reichstag is to finance and manage external affairs—the colonies, the navy, the tariffs. The more fruitful business of social policy falls to the individual States. But external policy is, in all countries, the last department over which democracy acquires a real control. The second reason is, however, the decisive factor. The Imperial Chancellor is also ex officio the First Minister of Prussia. He incarnates the Prussian hegemony, and he necessarily represents the narrow spirit of Prussian class rule. Until the Prussian franchise is widened, there can never be a Liberal Ministry in Prussia, and it is Prussia which gives her ruler to Germany. It is not merely the Court and the Kaiser whose servant the Chancellor is. He is the official expression of the coalition of squires and manufacturers who govern Prussia by the three-class franchise. In no modern State is personal rule really possible. It seems possible only because it conserves in Prussia the economic interests of this dominant class. On the day when the Socialists win universal suffrage in Prussia, this elaborate system will fall. Prussia is the key to the citadel, and its capture depends much more upon the resentment of the working classes against their economic grievances, than upon the rather academic protests of the middle-class parties in the Reichstag against the Kaiser's indiscretions. The bureaucracy, if it is ever overthrown, will fall rather as the result of a general strike in Prussia, than in consequence of a debate on the floor of the Reichstag.

A DEFEAT FOR CHURCH LIBERALISM.

Not only party Liberals but men specially concerned with the character and future of the Anglican Church must feel serious disappointment at the nomination of Dr. Lang for the Archbishopric of York. The choice is clearly plausible. Dr. Lang is young, he is able, he belongs to the school of Church thought which, though it recedes in true power, retains its temporal influence, he has all the social activities which count for so much in modern Church life, he has made a certain mark in Chuch diplomacy and organisation, he is a Tory, and his appointment cannot be called a party one. He is, indeed, said to have done the Government the notable service of joining the Archbishop of Canterbury in the auspicious attempt to establish terms of peace between Anglicanism and Nonconformity on the education question—a service all the more conspicuous as it contrasts rather sharply with Dr. Lang's early and very decisive intervention in the controversy over the London schools. Yet, for all these merits and distinctions, we confess the appointment leaves us cold. It adds another High Churchman to a Bench which is full of High Churchmen. It follows too much the essentially worldly view of Church policy which has turned the ecclesiastical Bench into a kind of managerial office for the Establishment, and which assumes that a Bishop must be, above all things, a good man of business. It is on this theory, we suppose, that a man of real force of mind and character, of independence of thought, and, above all, of unwonted courage and liberality in speech, is passed by in favor of a recurrence to the now prevailing type of Bishop, and that even men on the Bench who, like Dr. Percival, possess real moral and intellectual distinction, but belong to a less liberal school of thought, are also neglected. Does the Church really not want thinkers and scholars like the Bishop of Birmingham, or elevated personalities like the Bishop of Southwark, so much as governors of the mundane type of the new Archbishop of York?

We shall, we suppose, be answered in the first case that the passing over of Dr. Percival is adequately explained by his age. We cannot regard this as a very serious argument. Dr. Temple was offered the Archbishopric of Canterbury when he was seventy-five, a year older than Dr. Percival. Mr. Asquith has served under one Prime Minister who closely approached the age of the Bishop of Hereford, and under another who far exceeded it. For our part, we do not find the youth of the new Archbishop of York to be in itself a qualification. Is it advisable to give the control of one of the two ecclesiastical provinces to a man who, as nature goes, may count on thirty years' tenure of office? Dr. Lang does not belong to the more progressive type of Churchman. We should hardly reckon his attitude to modern Biblical scholarship to be as advanced, or, at all events, as well thought-out, as that of Dr. Gore. Certainly his views of Church policy must be held to bar any approach to union between the Anglican Church and Nonconformists. Yet we may fairly reckon that for more than a generation the Northern Province will know no other governor. Above all, we fear that the considered rejection of a man of so open a mind as Dr. Percival must act as a grave discouragement to the rising spirit of Liberalism in the Church of England. It would have been an act of statesmanship to place in high authority a Bishop to whom the younger clergy could have looked as a friend both of social movements and of the spirits of freedom and progress. With what reason can Liberal statesmen complain of the unbending conservatism of the Church when they give no room for the growth of fresher, more sympathetic, influences? These tendencies must, it is clear, go forward with little help or shelter in places of authority. For that reason they are likely to be all the more disruptive when they come into their kingdom.

Life and Letters.

PITT THE ELDER.

Mr. Frederic Harrison said justly on Monday in the interesting paper he read to the Historical Society that Chatham more than any other Englishman had stamped his ideas on the history of the world. Lord Rosebery once drew a picture of the British Empire as it might have been if the thirteen American colonies had never left it. It would take a greater effort of the imagination to draw a picture of an America not Anglo-Saxon at all, but French in its genius, its development, and its destinies. Yet, when Pitt became Prime Minister, the fate not only of America but of India trembled in the balance. When he retired from office it had been settled that England and not France was to give her ideas to the one and her decrees to the other. It was a momentous issue, and it was settled in five years. The man to whose prowess, resolution, and foresight the world owes that decision never governed his country again. He had won his supremacy from a position unprivileged or almost obscure, by methods that would have destroyed most men's careers. After becoming the first man in Europe he threw away his power by a series of mistakes that would have damaged the credit of a third-rate politician. The achievements of those five years, during which Fortune would not allow him a single failure, would have been dramatic enough if he had been born to power or if he had known how to keep the power he had acquired. As it is, the romance which envelops his memory is colored by those remarkable vicissitudes which seem to suggest that Fortune, repenting of the favors she had largessed with so spendthrift a hand, resolved to deny him for the rest of his life a single success.

The significant thing about the amazing inconsistencies and shifts, so ruthlessly caricatured by Smollett in "The History and Adventures of an Atom," through which Pitt picked and forced his way to the front is that the nation forgave them. It was a sure instinct that enabled his countrymen to see that if he was ambitious for power, it was from other motives than those which inspired the contests and stratagems of his contemporaries. He was possessed by the belief that he and he alone could extricate his country from the predicaments in which it had been involved by the masters of intrigue and failure who surrounded the Court. He fought directly for his own advancement, but only as a means to great public ends. In a world where private booty was the first prize in politics, his eager and savage pursuit of leadership stood out as a noble ambition, excusing the means it employed. His success was a public interest. Believing that he had been born to save England, he made England believe it too. When once the nation had put him at the head of affairs everybody else believed it, from the Courts of Versailles and Berlin to the obscurest soldier or sailor dying on the banks of the St. Lawrence, or the heights of Abraham, for his sudden and daring plans. The nation itself did not grasp the revolution which he had made in foreign policy, or understand all that this intoxicating career of conquest meant. All that his countrymen knew, amid the triumphs that burst on their ears after many years of doubt and misgiving, was that the man they had trusted who had stormed the Court had now stormed the world.

Pitt was little more than fifty when his last triumph shook England. One half of his task was accomplished. His other task remained undone, and so it remained at his death seventeen years later. It is interesting to speculate on the difference it would have made in the history of the world if Pitt had failed in his foreign policy. It would be scarcely less interesting to speculate on the difference it would have made in the history of England if he had succeeded in his domestic policy. Godwin said of him that his first idea was to win an immortal glory by attacking corruption at home, and that he turned to foreign victories as a path that led to more certain and more immediate applause. But the two aims were not inconsistent, and it is plain that Pitt meant to use the glory he had won in accomplishing the first aim for the prosecution of the second. Unhappily, his errors of judgment or his eccentricities of character betrayed his purposes, and if the abuses which he sought to destroy were more powerfully entrenched when he died than they were when he took office, the blame is largely his. He was infinitely the most powerful man in England in 1761; but it was the will of the new King, and not his will, that directed English politics for the last sixteen years of his life, with results disastrous not only to English liberty, but to the unity of that Empire which Pitt had made outwardly secure.

George III., who had come to the throne when Pitt's power was at its height, had resolved to break up the party connections which surrounded his Court and to carry out Bolingbroke's dream and play the patriot king. If he had been a man of consummate genius and of popular sympathies, his design would have been attractive, and his career, whether he failed or succeeded, interesting. Unfortunately, he was a man of mediocre ability and exclusive and anti-popular views. He represented the worst of the prejudices of the aristocracy on almost any question that presented itself to him. As Mr. Morley said of him in his first book on Burke, "there is nothing more fatal, either in private life or in the larger affairs of State, than for an incompetent man to grasp a principle of action that is too big for him. Such was the case of this wretched sovereign." Now, there was much in the King's programme that appealed to Pitt's imagination. He was sick of the old cabals and hated the government of the great Whig houses, with their traditions of plunder and selfishness. It is true his own policy aimed rather at creating an omnipotent Minister than an omnipotent king, and that, though he refused to accept the slighting Whig view of the King's position, he looked rather to public opinion than the Crown for the source of power. But his impatience of party attachments put him at the mercy of the King. For the dissolution of parties meant the disappearance of all organisation of public men for public ends outside the influence of the Crown and the unchecked power of the King's creatures and cabals. There was at the time a party in being in the Rockinghams which had been created by the genius of Burke, not to preserve a system of private interests, but to promote certain public ends. The success or failure of the King's system turned on the relations of Pitt with this party. Every other party was for sale. If Pitt had put himself at their head, as they wished, the King would have been no match for them. If he had supported them from outside the King could not have got rid of them in 1766. Unfortunately, he used his power to enable the King to dismiss the only set of men who shared his views on public questions, and the Government which he formed on their defeat did almost everything that he hated. The Rockinghams in their brief and precarious life repealed the Stamp Act; condemned general warrants, and restored the lords-lieutenant who had been dismissed for opposing the Peace of Paris. From the moment the Rockinghams went out of office, the policy of the country was conducted consistently on lines of which Pitt violently disapproved. The Government which he formed himself on their fall was not a year old before it taxed American imports, and within three years it pronounced the exclusion of Wilkes. Throughout its career it attacked Chatham's ideas as vigorously as the Rockinghams had attacked the King's prejudices. Chatham's madness was, of course, a stroke of luck for the King, but it was the mistakes which he made before that calamity happened that called this heterogeneous Government into existence. We may give the fullest weight to the case Lord Fitzmaurice has presented for Pitt's unfriendly isolation from the Rockinghams in 1765, but the course which left the Court and its policy of coercion abroad and at home securely established, is surely its own condemnation. Pitt himself almost confessed as much in 1770 when he announced the union between himself and the Rockinghams, which, if it had come five years earlier, would have changed the course of history.

But there were other obstacles to Pitt's success as a domestic statesman besides this capital misconception. His arrogance, as Mr. Harrison remarks, if it helped to make him invincible in war, helped to make him intolerable in council. "His language," said Conway, "is such as is not usually heard west of Constantinople." It was easier for a nation to admire his career from a distance, than for colleagues to enjoy working out its details with him at close quarters. He was unhappy in his friendships. Conway was less bitter about him than his own follower, Shelburne. Camden, his other intimate adherent, was strangely unmoved by his death. His artificial manners all but concealed his passionate sincerity. His nervous system, as Sir Andrew Clark once explained, was disordered by suppressed gout, which drove him at times into a mental depression equivalent to insanity. His incapacity for forming or leading a party was the more to be lamented, because, if only he had thrown in his lot with the Rockinghams, he would, besides destroying the King's power, have widened that party's outlook. He was much more of a democrat than the Rockinghams. Unlike Burke, he believed in Parliamentary Reform, and he became a convert to triennial Parliaments. He was free from the superstitions of the oligarchy, and his mad, noisy City friends, as Newcastle called them, reminded the Portlands and the Bedfords that government would not always be the subject of the bargains of the great houses. Had his power grown instead of declining, had he led the Rockinghams or inspired their policy, the invasions of the monopoly of the Revolution families would have come not from the Crown, but from the people, and the Reform which was achieved in 1832 might have been half a century earlier.

Pitt then did nothing to weaken, and a good deal involuntarily to fortify, the influence of the Crown, which became the curse of his times. But there were three great services that he did to English public life. He set a standard of personal integrity and delicacy in regard to money, which seemed quixotic in an age in which corruption was rife. He made public opinion a power, and it was recognised by the King, by Parliament, and by the nation, that he was the representative of the people, which had forced him on the Court and the aristocracy. But, perhaps, his greatest service is to be found in the supreme example of moral courage which he gave in rejoicing in the resistance of America, and in impeaching the use of savage allies. That virtue which he taught to his age never disappeared, even in the worst days of the reaction. Think of Fox leading out his handful of Liberals night after night against the Treason and Sedition Bills, of Fox's nephew pleading, almost alone, before an audience of Bishops, for the abolition of capital punishment for stealing, of Burke's elaborate rage playing round the dazzling renown of a Rodney, and of a man so little given to revolutionary sympathies as Fitzwilliam leaving his Lord Lieutenancy rather than condone the massacre of Peterloo. If moral courage is the power of combating and defying an enveloping atmosphere of prejudice and passion and panic, a generation which was poor in almost every other virtue was conspicuously rich in that one. And the statesmen who fought those forlorn battles for hopeless causes could always point to the greatest Englishman of his day, whose courage in facing and conquering his country's dangers was not greater than the courage with which he blamed her crimes.

THE CONFESSION OF MR. WELLS.

In a sense all true literature is a personal confession of faith. But the literary art has evolved, for purposes of pride or pleasure, so many devices of indirectness, reticence, and feigned objectivity, as greatly to impair its power. This has been in large part due to a certain artificiality of decorative culture, which is slow to disappear. The very name "culture" suggests a delicacy and a seclusion which restrict the services that literature can render to life. The revision of literary aims and methods, which popular education and the new scientific interpretation of life require, is very difficult of achievement. The modern man and modern life, which Whitman, conscious of his "barbaric yaup," sought to sing, have as yet failed to find any adequate expression in our poetry.

The reason for this failure is plain enough. The young men and women of the new education, the product of the continuation school, the Polytechnic, South Kensington, University Extension, alert, town-bred, curious, distrustful of authoritative forms and phrases in an age of shifting creeds and policies, distracted by the disorderly procession of sensational and intellectual novelties, do not see life steadily enough for any literature more profound than Kipling to bite upon their intelligence and emotions. They have no philosophy, no religion, no art of individual or social conduct, and very little consciousness of the need of such things. The great standard sources of world-wisdom, the saints, prophets, poets, and philosophers, do not suffice. Between them and these restless souls there is a great gulf fixed, a gulf none the less real that it is the creation of a disbelief. The notion that Homer, Dante, Shakespeare, Milton, Wordsworth can do, or are doing, for this newly enlightened generation what is needed to bring them in a saner relation towards life and their fellows, is, we fear, chimerical. Men, bone of their bone, flesh of their flesh, children of the self-same spirit of this age of change and hurry and achievement, are wanted for this task of interpretation and reconcilement. A few men and women, with the will and the power to tell in plain words the naked truths of thought and feeling about themselves, their relations to their fellows and the world, to vivisect their souls for the benefit of others, can, we hold, perform the greatest practical service demanded of literature at this time.

The extraordinary difficulties of such a work we need not dwell upon. It wants, of course, wide interests, deep sympathy, and a genius of self-expression. Within a century there have been few such revelations in our literature, nearly all the more familiar and effective using a prose vehicle, De Quincey, Lamb, Hazlitt, among the earlier, Ruskin and Stevenson among the later. It is a hopeful sign of recent years that a more or less formal confession of faith is coming to be recognised as a duty which inspired Liberals owe this generation. In this spirit unceasingly write Mr. G. B. Shaw and Mr. Chesterton, to name two well-known instances. But though these writers have some important requisites of the confession—a firm conviction of their complete self-sufficiency, a disregard of all trespass-boards, and a tolerably perfect lack of reticence—we do not feel sure how far they are capable of telling the truth, so intricate is the distorting influence of combative humor.

Now, Mr. Wells impresses us differently. His upbringing, education, early experiences of life, have given a quite peculiar value to his gifts of insight and of literary expression. Even in those wilder romances where he shoots at long range with his fancy, sharp thrusts of insight into the solid business of actual life abound, while in such works as "Kipps" and its congeners we get unique disclosure of the social tragi-comedy. It seems as if Mr. Wells were always struggling to get at close quarters with general and particular truth, and that his different sorts of books stood for a set of different ranges. For his method is never really that of the philosophic or scientific system-monger, but always that of the sharpshooter. He has sometimes blown out a big bubble of imagination until it reached the dimensions of a world. But his critics have taken these improvised Utopias more seriously than their maker, who only made them to see how they looked, and to get some new perspective of realities as reflected from their shining surfaces. In his last "serious" book, "New Worlds for Old," though coming to close grips with the social problems of to-day, he still retains fragments of the older playful manner. But in this new small book, "First and Last Things" (Constable), he comes to life at closest range, with most compact and gravest utterance. We can already detect among reviewers the snappy tone of the academic person who sees this "unqualified" young sciolist hurriedly traversing the sacred groves of philosophy and the sciences, religion and politics, and executing short, sharp judgments on the most recondite and baffling issues. But this is no proper attitude to take towards such a book. If his metaphysics sometimes resemble the probing of the sharp child into parental theology, or the naive scepticism with which the taproom yokel pricks some pompous orthodoxy of the educated man, it is the better, not the worse, for that. For Mr. Wells is keen enough to realise and use the freshness of an intellect unspoiled by much wandering through barren wastes of loose speculative verbiage, and yet to grasp the modern setting and importance of the half-dozen questions which all this high-falutin' talk and print is fumbling after. The limits of our capacity of knowledge set by the nature of our intellectual tools, the adoption of beliefs because they "work" for us and satisfy our desire for harmony, the tracing of this formative and regulative thought to roots of human feeling, and the adoption of an "unfounded and arbitrary declaration of the ultimate rightness and significance of things"—boldly termed "the Act of Faith"—such doctrines bring Mr. Wells very near the school of Pragmatists. But from this sheer precipice of thought he plucks himself away, demanding a Universe apart from the mere mind of man, with a Scheme and a Purpose, which transcend our knowing, but which some compulsion of our nature makes us premise.

Armed with this apprehension of the limits of our logic and the Act of Faith, he proceeds to make a lightning sketch of "the whole duty of man" towards the Universe, himself, and his fellowmen. It is the swift, almost simultaneous, survey of the whole field of modern conduct, in the light of this passionate demand for the devotion of man towards this Purpose, which Mr. Wells almost consents to call divine, and of the more intense personal love, in which the separate individuality of man finds expression, the extensive and the intensive spirit of devotion, that give the unique quality to this book. It is a clear, strenuous, and even passionate, endeavor of a modern Freethinker to "give himself away," not primarily to serve a cause of science, as in one who should leave his brain for post mortem dissection to a medical school, but in order to stir in others that faith and devotion which he himself professes.

We cannot discuss the many debatable issues of public and private conduct upon which he pronounces in seeking the new moral order. Some of his frank, searching utterances on Christianity and, perhaps, on sex relations, will give offence to those who are not liberal enough to recognise that such earnest use of liberty of speech is infinitely more important than the rightness or wrongness of the opinions. For here, in an age where men are idly wandering round the débris of fallen faiths with listless eyes and hands in pockets, comes a man with brisk, interested face, full of eager, thoughtful plans of reconstruction, passionately anxious to set men once more at home in the new Universe which is opened up to us. His improvisation may be too rapid and, in parts, defective, a hit and miss philosophy of life. But it is full of thought and of goodwill, and of what we would even call a new-found soul. For the somewhat steely mechanism of Mr. Wells's earlier schemes of social reform has yielded to a far more human, and so more spiritual, conception of the Universe and society. So, too, most of the dogmatism has dropped away with the plain recognition that the foundations of his whole edifice are laid in personal needs. Sometimes the allowance demanded by this personal equation is considerable. The attitude of scorn towards popular notions of equality, as expressed in political democracy, is not consistent with his eloquent exposition of the creed of human solidarity. For if there is that subtle social spirit which denies the spiritual separateness and asserts the union of man with man, that spirit surely has a wisdom of its own, which gives true inspiration to the vox populi, even in Parliament and ballot-box. The self-conscious superiority of the efficient person is almost as paralysing an influence in modern progress as was the selfish arrogance of the barbarian aristocrat in former days.

One other palpable clot seems to check the free flow of the new spirit in Mr. Wells. His attitude towards war expresses that curious phenomenon, the sentimental ferocity of gentle souls, which such writers as Ruskin and Henley have illustrated, and which the recent Boer War showed in so many cases of timid women and college bookworms. It is one thing to recognise that, in a crude state of international morality, armies and wars are necessary, and that their force may even open certain doors through which nobler influences may enter. It is quite another to express the conviction that, "on the whole, there is far more good than evil in the enormous military growths that have occurred in the last half-century." It is a strange myopia which prevents Mr. Wells from seeing the truth manifest to most of the cruder "Socialists," whose materialism and class-hatred he so severely condemns, that this atavistic faith in physical force is the deadliest enemy of the realisation of that nobler Purpose in State and Church by which the spirit of love works out human salvation. For Mr. Wells carries his belief in the solidarity of mankind so far as even to depreciate the importance of a personal survival in which nothing of real importance survives. "And what, after all" (he concludes) "is my distinctive something: a few capacities, a few incapacities, an uncertain memory, a hesitating presence? It matters, no doubt, in its place and time, as all things matter in their place and time, but where in it all is the eternally indispensable? The great things of my life, love, faith, the intimation of beauty, the things most savouring of humanity, are the things most general, the things most shared and least distinctively me."

THE GATES OF SENSE.

Tartars have no reputation for culture, and as a centre of sweetness and light Baku cannot hold a candle to Boston. The Tartar and Armenian workmen there slaughter each other for days together (the reciprocity being mainly on one side), and murder associations collect contributions, for which they deliver properly audited accounts when their purpose is accomplished. Yet there, beside the shores of the Caspian, a Tartar is now dwelling who has translated the opening of the third book of "Paradise Lost" into the Tartar language—a dialect of Turkish—and into Persian as well. Of English he knows nothing but what he has dug out of a Russian dictionary, and his voice, always incomprehensible to an English ear, dissolves with emotion into a mere chaos of sounds when he reaches the supreme lines:—

> "Thus with the year
> Seasons return; but not to me returns
> Day, or the sweet approach of even or morn,
> Or sight of vernal bloom, or summer's rose,
> Or flocks, or herds, or human face divine;
> But cloud instead and ever-during dark
> Surrounds me, from the cheerful ways of men
> Cut off, and, for the book of knowledge fair,
> Presented with a universal blank
> Of Nature's works, to me expunged and rased,
> And wisdom at one entrance quite shut out.
> So much the rather thou, Celestial Light,
> Shine inward, and the mind through all her powers
> Irradiate."

In those lines there lives a charm that overcomes the savage breast of Mohammedan Tartars, not otherwise distinguished for sympathetic benignity.

It is the charm of an irreparable loss, fully realised in all its significance, but converted with steadfast courage into gain. There is a kindred charm about the writings of the lady who calls herself Miss Helen Keller. That may, for all we know, be her real name, but in the atmosphere of her books we enter upon a miraculous region, in which nothing feels quite certain. It was so in her "Story of My Life," and it is so again in her present book, "The World I Live In" (Hodder & Stoughton). In one of her admirably written essays she says, "Some brave doubters have gone so far as to deny my existence." We can assure her that no great courage is required for that. It is for believing in her existence that courage is required, and to accept that belief we have to be as brave as our ancestors when they were first informed that the earth spins round the sun, or that man is descended from jellyfish. That a human being who has never seen a vestige of light or heard a single sound should have risen to the state of mental power revealed in these essays is a thing that defies experience. It takes us, as we have said, into the region of miracles. If it were not true, it would be ludicrously false—an American "fake," and no more.

We speak of Miss Keller's mental power, and, indeed, it is evident that she has cultivated a singularly strong and persistent mind to a high degree of discernment and appreciation. Her knowledge of the best writers, the best poets, and even of the best musicians, alone would prove it. Her very language would prove it—so clear and simple, with just a gleam of irony shining across it; and perhaps it is not fantastic to say that, if it is sometimes a little "precious," it is a style that can be felt rather than heard, just as marbles and jewels can be felt. But it is not her knowledge or her style that are the real points of interest. As she characteristically complains, "Nobody cares what I think of the tariff, or the conservation of our national resources." The wonder is, not what she thinks, but that she should think at all. Hearing and sight have always been accounted the spiritual senses, the purest and most intimate gateways to the soul. To Miss Keller these gates have always been closed. In her case, wisdom has been shut out, not at one entrance when, like Milton, she had already reached middle age, but at the two main entrances, and from her birth. By courage and persistence she has none the less become possessed of wisdom, and it need not surprise her if the courage and persistence attract more attention than the wisdom itself. For here we have character raised to genius, and that is rare.

From birth she was thrown back on the three senses that are called the lower. Of the three, taste may almost be omitted in the acquirement of outside knowledge. By a queer metaphor, it is true, taste gives the standard of ordinary behaviour, and we must not attribute our use of "good taste," or "bad taste," to an Englishman's gluttonous or drunken propensities; for most modern languages use the same expression; as though you could test conduct by sucking it. But, after all, it is only in feeble and unimportant things that we speak of taste as the criterion—in neckties, social intercourse, and public speeches. We never use it of the great passions or actions of mankind. Not even an eighteenth-century critic ever said that Romeo and Juliet displayed good or indifferent taste in their affection, and the man on a steamer does not extol the Nelson taste, but the Nelson touch.

So that, for the higher knowledge, Miss Keller had only two of the senses left—touch and smell. Of these, smell is a dying sense. Among civilised tribes like ours it is dying of atrophy; so, indeed, is sight, but smell dies quicker. From thousands of common nostrils it has absolutely gone, and in our cities that is a happy release. There is very little from which smell can guard the civilised man, and it can bring little but disgust "where houses thick and sewers annoy the air." Yet Miss Keller rightly calls smell "the fallen angel." To herself it has been of high assistance, both for pleasure and also as a means of recognition and the judgment of character. We all know that smell is the chief agent of memory, and that a casual smell will unawares call up the entire picture and association of a scene or house or city, long laid up in the cerements of time. That is why rosemary, for its distinctive and stimulating smell, stands for remembrance. "A whiff of the universe," writes Miss Keller, "recalls in a flash entire epochs of our dearest experience." Dogs remember by the nose, and so should we if we did not let the faculty die:—

> "If many years should elapse," Miss Keller says, "before I saw an intimate friend again, I think I should recognise his odour instantly in the heart of Africa, as promptly as would my brother that barks."

The present writer once tried an experiment with a bull-mastiff whom he had taken for long walks and generally befriended. After an absence of many months he put a suit of his own clothes on a stranger whom the dog had never seen before, and though the dog was violently hostile to strangers, he received the clothes with exuberant delight—much to the relief of the man who wore them.

But to Miss Keller, touch has been the chief revelation of the universe. It is by touch almost entirely that she has learnt language and literature and a kind of music and nature and the souls of men. She has used her hand as a feeler for life. She speaks of "the seeing hand." In her quiet way she remarks: "It is not for me to say whether we see better with the hand or the eye." In touch, she says, is all love and intelligence, and the authoress of the "South African Farm" had said the same. Before she came to the consciousness of an awakened soul, Miss Keller believes she thought and desired in her fingers. "If I had made a man," she writes, "I should certainly have put the brain and soul in his finger-tips." And for examples of her educated power of touch, take this passage:—

> "The delicate tremble of a butterfly's wings in my hand, the soft petals of violets curling in the cool folds of their leaves or lifting sweetly out of the meadow-grass, the clear, firm outline of face and limb, the smooth arch of a horse's neck, and the velvety touch of his nose—all these, and a thousand resultant combinations, which take shape in my mind, constitute my world."

In the same way, the touch of other people's hands is Miss Keller's surest guide to personality. "I have clasped the hands of some rich people," she says, "that spin not and toil not, and yet are not beautiful. Beneath their soft, smooth roundness what a chaos of undeveloped character!" We have all known those rich hands, and have wondered whether they are not more repulsive even than the hand that is now like a fish and now like a snake. But Miss Keller has this intuition of touch raised to a higher power. It is concentration that has raised it, just as the loss of a sense raised the powers of blind Thamyris and blind Mæonides, and probably of Beethoven himself. But at the back of sense or loss of sense there lurks the sensitive soul, without whose power sensations do not count. To quote Miss Keller again, "The keenness of our vision depends not on how much we can see, but on how much we can feel." And so there arises the further question: suppose Miss Keller deprived from birth of the two other senses of touch and smell; of what kind of thought would her sensitive spirit then have been capable? Would it have existed like a hermit-crab in a blocked-up shell? Granting that there is a personality, remote, distinct, and undiscovered—a soul, or "ego," or something, that sums up sensations, what would become of it if there were no sensations to sum up? We wonder whether it could be said to exist at all. But we wonder also whether we are not approaching the misty figure of a science that sits at the back of physics—"like black Care behind the horseman," Huxley used to say.

SIGHTS AND SOUNDS OF THE FALL.

The fall has come upon our countryside with dramatic suddenness this year. It is true that, ever since the end of September, a million billion leaves have been fluttering down almost one by one till the trees bore less than a tenth of their summer foliage. But the remaining tenth continued to make a brave show, especially when the reds and yellows of autumn had come into them. After weeks of mainly fine weather, with nights little lower in temperature than the day, and with little wind to strip off the lightly hung leaves, came a night of keen frost. The films of moisture between the base of the leaves and the twigs expanded into ice, and when the thaw came in the morning, down came the golden shower.

Nearly every tree stands bright and clean, the rich stain on the grass beneath now appealing to the eye for the first time, because it is not outshone by an uplifted and better lighted glory. No wind has come yet to sweep the distinct hues of chestnut, beech, elm, and maple into one tangle of drift against the coppice bank. The oaks still cling to their old gold, seeming to rejoice in the removal of the more fiery beech leaves. The boughs loom through like black snakes twisted in the torment of fire, for the leaves that have not fallen are shrivelled to half their former expanse. The stain of fallen leaves is beneath the oaks, too, but it does not strike the eye as it does under the wholly denuded beeches and chestnuts. The high opposite bank of the river has caught what little wind-drift there has been, so that you can trace where the yellow water flows by the ochreous stain of the entrenchment.

Our lake is a shallow one, with what the angler calls gin-clear water. In winter we can see every fish in it, especially in those places where the bottom is of yellowish clay. But to-day the soft Canadian pond-weed still clothes the floor thickly enough for any fish that has a mind to hide himself. There lurk the pike, their convenient eyes cast upward, so that no gleam of passing roach can escape them. The roach also are out of sight and reasonably safe, but the irrepressible small perch cannot keep still, and it is at them that every now and then the pike dash, sending the lucky ones skipping out before their noses and ending the lives of others in a swirl that shows us the white throat of the pursuer as he turns and shoots back into the weeds.

There is an angler at work who cannot understand why his Thames dace swim with impunity over this pike-haunted forest, while the water boils everywhere with feeding fish. He will not believe that a prickly-finned perch would make a better lure than his fat and easy dace, but, having toiled long and caught nothing, is willing to give the unlikely thing a trial. The float has scarcely righted itself after the throw-in before it is snapped under, and then goes towing off in a long slant that makes the pike certain prey. So there are days when pike will not take even the rare treat of a dace, because they happen to be looking for some other food that is naturally on the move.

The beautiful day has brought abroad other Englishmen intent on killing something. In the coppice there is thrashing of boughs and the odd shouts and "prrts" with which the local beaters move pheasants. The poor things cannot understand it, though they have already been driven and shot at once or twice. Not till the white smocks are beginning to break through the threadbare wood do they go off in their straight, laborious line towards another thicket. Easy as the shot seems, one or two of the long-tailed, short-winged birds flutter through the hail and sail on stiff aeroplanes to their shelter. Another takes the line, and is well under weigh, when a grey puff from his feathers tells that the smoking charge has reached him. Down out of the blue he tumbles and almost reaches the ground before the report of the gun that killed him reaches our ears. Another flies on after two barrels have sounded, then apparently misses step, and, pitching aslant, tumbles over once and lies still. A gambolling spaniel fetches the ruin to the gunner.

It is the gun that peoples the air with many beautiful forms of life, just as the rod peoples the waters with rainbows, steel-heads and red-breasted charr. Heedless of the fusilade that is slaughtering the pheasants, a great number of semi-wild ducks make the park lively with their social and patriarchal ceremonies and adventures. There is a conclave on each side of the lake, and now and then a mallard comes flying from afar to drop spirally down towards the water, now steering above one group at a tangent, now wheeling on till another is beneath him, and, at last, alighting with a counter spiral on the water, where he strikes a long white line before he pulls himself up. A file comes from the brook to the lake, walking through the red beech leaves, a mallard leading, then duck and mallard alternating till a duck closes the line. There are few things in nature so masculine as a gorgeous autumn drake, nothing so feminine as his sober duck. She is so dowdy and matter-of-fact by contrast to her plump and self-satisfied mate. The lines of her head and neck are eminently wifely, and she is so bored with the battles of the menfolk about goodness only knows what. Yet now and then a mood seizes her that is nothing else than a fit of giggles as she wriggles her head and lets fall a medley of tiny quacks, usually at a time when the men are talking politics and have forgotten the very existence of their wives. Yes, these semi-wild ducks of the park are very interesting, with their winged races, their strivings after polygamy, that always end in monogamy, their walking parties, and their naval manœuvres. But as something to be shot, they and the hen-bred pheasants are a miserable makeshift. The true autumn sport should be supplied to us from the teeming north, in skeins of geese and ducks that have never gabbled round the feet of a feeder, and have, at least, not that charge of ingratitude and treachery to urge mutely against the man who shoots them. The north is getting tired of pouring down these flying drifts of birds on our land. The gunner's welcome has been too warm, and the agriculturist has drained so many miles of once crowded mere. Norfolk and some other favored localities still attract their wild-fowl, but it is only one for every ten that used to come, and the rest of the country is seldom visited by great geese gone astray in the fog or welcome streams of adventurous duck.

The excitement with which the first woodcock is seen is a measure of the superiority of real game to the pampered pheasant. Luckily no one has yet found a way to rear snipe or woodcock artificially, a fact that makes them rare in a double sense, for the natural supply is apt to grow less and the survivors more and more able to take care of themselves. The harsh chuckle of a band of fieldfares streaming from one berried hawthorn hedge to another reminds us that there are other winter migrants that still come to us in swarms. They are, fortunately, as far beneath the sportsman's gun by convention as they usually are above it and beyond it in actual flight. They are welcome to the hospitality of our clement winter. Their keep costs little enough—a few worms and the wild fruit of the hedges, to which there are no other claimants than our complaining thrushes and blackbirds. All the same, they take no risks, and it is only from a considerable distance that we are allowed to witness their noisy scramble in the trees as they take their afternoon meal. As the sky begins to get rosy with one of the best sunsets of the year, the fieldfares make off in a long wavering, straggling cloud to their roosting-place on the downs. A pheasant in the covert crows his praise that an awful day has ended.

Letters from Abroad.

THE GERMANISATION OF THE BALKANS.

SARAJEVO, BOSNIA, November 6th, 1908.

SIR,—We sat round a table in a Serb hotel in Sarajevo and talked of the German peril. There was a Dane who spoke of Slesvig, a Frenchman who spoke of Alsace-Lorraine, a German Pole whose land had been expropriated by the Germans, and Signor Chiesa, an Italian deputy belonging to the Republican Group, who had come to Bosnia in order to collect material for denouncing in the Italian Chamber Signor Tittoni and the alliance with Austria. The language in which he denounced Germany was—German, but occasionally the Dane talked to the Italian deputy in French, and I spoke to a Serb friend in Russian, which is very closely akin to Serb.

As these victims of the Germanic wave compared notes, I was surprised that I had not noticed the progress of the German wave before. Let me take the facts that concern Bosnia and the adjacent Slavonic districts. During the last twenty years 100,000 Germans have settled in Croatia, German villages are now to be found as far south as Salonica, and the emigration of the Slavs from Herzegovina is so great that the country will soon be empty, and therefore in a fit condition to be parcelled out among German settlers. Even on the extreme southern point of Bosnia, the signs of Germanisation are evident. On the brow of the great mountain which constitutes the frontier of Novi Bazar are three gigantic letters, the initials of the words "Francis Joseph, Imperator," and at the frontier turn of Ubatz all the signs and inscriptions on public buildings are in German.

Vienna does not confine herself, however, to tracing letters twenty feet long on the brow of a mountain. She has set herself with great skill and perseverance to crush the Serbs of Bosnia and to make that province German.

THE PRESS.

Consider, in the first place, how Austria is dealing with the Serb Press. The Press is one of the greatest obstacles to the Germanising of Bosnia, therefore it is being treated far worse than in any other country in the world, not excepting Russia. After the Young Turk movement succeeded in Constantinople, the editor of the "Serbsky Retch" of Sarajevo remarked that "Now Bosnia is the only country in Europe that has not got a constitution." For this offence the editor was kept in prison for four months without trial. There is no special Press law, any more than in Russia, but, as in Russia, the police are able to do what they like with the Press.

I visited a Serb newspaper office here the other day, and found that the only foreign papers in the office are the "Neue Freie Presse" of Vienna and the "Pesther Lloyd" of Buda-Pesth, both of them semi-official Austro-Hungarian papers. Every other foreign paper to which this Serb journal subscribes is seized in the post, and if the editors manage to get French or English papers surreptitiously and translate from them anything bearing on the Bosnian question, they are confiscated and fined. Not a single Serbian paper is allowed to enter the country, and the late Count Kallay even prohibited the importation and sale of his own fairly impartial book about Servia.

Nor is it always safe to translate articles even from the "Neue Freie Presse." Some months ago the "Serbsky Retch" translated from that paper an article in which the question of granting autonomy to Bosnia was academically discussed. For this offence the editor was sent to prison, and is in prison still. Journalists are quite unable to say what kind of article will entail confiscation, so that all the Serb papers have now been cut down to one small page daily, and appear with one side of that page entirely blank. The local police officials of each town exercise their own judgment in punishing the Press, and sometimes an article which passes the censor in Sarajevo entails confiscation in Mostar. A short time ago a Mostar paper was confiscated for republishing an article which had appeared in a Serb paper in Sarajevo without the Sarajevo authorities objecting to it.

When a paper is confiscated, it is not only the editor who is punished, but the publisher, printer, office-boys, newsboys, business-agent, and advertising manager. A short time ago a paper in Banaluki printed an article entitled "The Powder is Ready," saying that in case of an Austro-Servian war, the Bosnians would help the Servians. For this about a dozen different people were sentenced to terms of imprisonment ranging from two years to nine years. The extent to which the Bosnian authorities go in their anxiety to exclude all literature which is politically undesirable is almost incredible. A few days ago, for instance, the "Neue Freie Presse" published a telegram from St. Petersburg to the effect that Mr. Iswolsky had declared to the chiefs of the various parties in the Duma that Russia would never recognise the annexation of Bosnia-Herzegovina by Austria. Not a single number of the issue of the "Neue Freie Presse" that contained this telegram was allowed to enter Bosnia. Even the Officers' Club failed to get a copy.

Under such a Chinese-wall system, a cabinet noir in the post office is, of course, a necessity, and though I generally pay little attention to stories of its activities, I have had proof that it exists and is hard at work in Bosnia. Twice in four months, for instance, it made the mistake of putting letters it had opened into the wrong envelopes, so that on one occasion a local anti-Governmental Serb got a communication intended for a wine merchant, while the wine merchant got the letter intended for the Serb. In the newspaper offices communications are sometimes received from the postmaster saying that a letter has arrived for the editor but that, as it is thought to contain illegal literature, the editor might kindly call for it at the police-office. Of course, the editor does not call.

In a Bosnian village a peasant who was found stealing wood was stripped naked by a gendarme, savagely beaten, and then made to walk round the village on his knees. For calling the attention of the Government to this matter, the "Serbsky Retch" was confiscated, though fifteen witnesses were ready to testify that the version of the affair which had appeared in that paper was correct.

The Forests.

Such is the treatment meted out to peasants who steal wood by a Government which has seized whole forests in Bosnia and Herzegovina. Some of these forests are public property, some of them belong to Mahomedan landowners; the Government has now got them all, and sold most of them to private companies, which are destroying them as rapidly as possible. One of the largest of these companies is Steinbeis & Co., a firm which has bought many square miles of forest at Novi Baneluki. This forest is worth several millions of kronen, but Steinbeis & Co. got it for a mere song, and they are now rapidly converting it into a desert. Needless to say, these German concessionaires do not come into the country to benefit the country, or the people, or the forests; they come to make money, and to make it as quickly as possible. And not only have such firms become very rich, but the Austrian officials stationed in their vicinity share their wealth.

The Schools.

What Austria has done for education in Bosnia-Herzegovina may be gathered from the fact that in every fifteen communes there is, on an average, only one school, while the Budget for the gendarmerie is larger than the Budget for education. The Budget appropriations for last year were as follows:—

Schools	675,790	kronen
Gendarmerie	753,189	,,
Army	7,830,000	,,
Bosnian Administration	5,139,300	,,

During thirty years Austria has opened only 362 schools in Bosnia, and of these 252 are in towns and frequented principally by the children of Austrians and of native Catholics. The remaining 110 are situated in the country and are considered sufficiently numerous for the children of the Orthodox Serbs, who, as is well known, constitute practically the entire population. Accordingly, the Orthodox Serbs have established 103 schools which they support out of their own pockets. As for the Higher Schools, there was one Serb Higher School in Sarajevo when the Austrians came, but they closed it. There are now eighty-seven gymnasiums, but all of them have been established in places where there are Austrian officials and they are frequented mostly by Austrians and native Catholic children.

The Officials.

Most of the officials are Austrians. A Chef de departement is nearly always an Austrian with no knowledge of the language, habits, or religion of the people he is appointed to rule, while, as in Slesvig, most of the other officials are stranded German officers and functionaries who have proved themselves to be worthless in their own country. No matter how much a young Serb distinguishes himself in school, he has no chance whatever of rising in the Government service unless he submits himself to the Power which rules Bosnia. Justice is still pure, but if Austria feels easy in her mind on the subject of European intervention, things will gradually become worse. The Serb language is still, for instance, used in the schools and the churches, but though no attempt has yet been made to replace it by German, there have been several endeavors to subject the educators and the pastors of the people to German influences. Some time ago a village pope, noticing that the children of his parishioners had no school to go to, offered to teach them himself, but the Government said, "No. We cannot permit that. You have not the qualifications of a teacher." Afterwards a young Serb doctor of philosophy, who had had a distinguished career in a German University, offered to teach the same children the alphabet, but was met by the same stereotyped refusal. "We cannot permit it. You have not the qualifications of a teacher."

Even the Government measures which look like genuine reforms are suspect. M. Burian, for instance, entered on his duties with loud protestations that he would give full freedom to the Bosnians and would redress all their grievances, and, as a matter of fact, he established a sort of communal assembly in various parts of the country. The complicated voting arrangements were so manipulated, however, that though the poll was everywhere very heavy, practically everybody voting who had a vote, the Roman Catholics —who are less than a third of the entire population— returned their candidates everywhere except at Mostar. They were very much assisted, of course, by the votes of swarms of German immigrants who had really no legal right to a vote at all.

The Church.

As to the Orthodox Church in Bosnia, it is entirely in the hands of the Austrians, the Metropolitan being an Austrian nominee, and the priests whom he appoints all of them pro-Austrians. The effect of this on people is extraordinary. Though very religious, like all the Slavs, they hate these pro-Austrian priests so much that for twenty years tens of thousands of them have never once entered a church. The children remain unbaptised and unconfirmed. Marriages are everywhere celebrated without the presence of the pope. Even to the national Slava, or feast of the patron-saint of the family, the pope is never invited, though by ancient custom his presence there is indispensable. Finally, the sick die and the dead are buried without any religious rites whatever. In the same way, the Moslim Serbs (who, like the Orthodox Serbs, number in Bosnia-Herzegovina over half-a-million, the Catholics numbering 334,142) are also at loggerheads with the Austrian nominees who act as their spiritual advisers.

In Bosnia there is a state of siege real but not formal; in Herzegovina the state of siege is both real and formal. Coming to Mostar last night, I was prohibited from entering the town until I had shown my passport, which was temporarily taken from me. In the town itself I saw more soldiers than inhabitants. Official proclamations posted up in the hotels call attention to the danger of taking photographs near fortified places. The railways all around are strongly guarded by troops, and in some villages near the Montenegrin frontier there are exactly as many soldiers as there are inhabitants. In Trebinya, for instance, there are 2,000 soldiers and 2,000 inhabitants. Many of the rebels of 1878 are still alive, but a gendarme has been quartered on each of them in order to prevent them heading another revolt. Under these circumstances, the declaration of the Austrian semi-official paper that the news of the annexation was received with rapture everywhere in Bosnia sounds a trifle ironical. As a Serb said to me the other day: "How could we express our feelings when the right of public meeting is withheld from us, when our newspapers appear, day after day, as a complete blank save for the advertisements"—[We have seen such papers, Ed., The Nation]— "when the only protest we have so far issued was drawn up by a number of representative Bosnians coming together surreptitiously in a railway carriage at Buda-Pesth? Let them take away their 75,000 soldiers, let them give us a chance of getting rifles in our hands, and they'll soon see what we think of the annexation."

If ever a country was held down by foreign bayonets against the will of 99 per cent. of the population, that country is Bosnia-Herzegovina. Even if Austria had benefited the people much more than she has done, there would be no excuse for her continued presence here. Servia's record, black as it is, is no good reason for refusing autonomy to the kindred people of Bosnia. But there is another argument which will go nearer home to Europe than this. Unless Austria leaves Bosnia, war will break out in the Balkans within six months, and there is no knowing how wide an area it may embrace.—Yours, &c.,

THE DISCOURAGEMENT OF THE LIBERAL CLERGY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The appointment to the Archbishopric of York is singularly lacking in freshness in its main feature, the kind of Churchman selected. It is precisely what we should have taken as natural from Lord Salisbury or Mr. Balfour. The selection for Newcastle was at least a change in that respect. But this appointment is still more depressing to Liberal Churchmen, because it was being hoped that the former miscarriage could not possibly be repeated after the clear expressions of dissatisfaction which it called forth. But now we have an Oxford Prime Minister, trained under Jowett, who has failed to see that the welfare of the Church is not bound up with what we may call the Keble College type of Churchmanship, and to take notice that in Oxford itself this group is declining rapidly in the face of the new forces and new ideas with which it fails to get on terms. Mr. Asquith has refrained from giving support to the genuinely Oxford tradition of Arnold and Stanley and Jowett, and has gone out of his way—for it could hardly have been expected of him—to bless the counter-tradition which, with all its attractiveness and nobility, has now spent its force in the Universities, and must sooner or later make way for wider views in the Church at large. A comparatively small point, but one which aggravates the disappointment is, that his recourse to this group has not been made in order to recognise the high qualifications for leadership in the Church of the foremost members of the school: there would have been some compensating alleviations had he done this in order to give wider opportunity for the force of character, the intellectual ability, and the wide social sympathies of the Bishops of Southwark or Birmingham; but he has chosen to pass over these in favor of a curate-Bishop without their record, and it looks as if the main reason for doing the unexpected was that very resort to the predominant ecclesiastical group which has caused our dismay.

The feature in the Prime Minister's action which looms most largely on reflecting minds is that he has missed seeing that what the Church needs now is to take a wider view of her commission in the nation, and a profounder view of the ideas by which Christian theology is being broadened and refreshed. Two years ago the guidance of the Church in the great city of Newcastle and its county was placed in the hands of a peculiarly unprogressive member of a group of Churchmen which is of unquestioned piety, but moves within ideas unfortunately limited to a narrow area of Christian thought. Now the guidance of the majority of Yorkshire Churchmen is entrusted to a member of a group with a much wider horizon indeed, yet with marked restrictions and limitations. It is therefore inferred by Churchmen that the Prime Minister, with all his opportunities and in spite of his own predilections, has not been able to discover any representatives of what is fairly well designated a Liberal habit and mode of thought as well within the Church as in matters outside its specific range. It is understood that by way of preserving decorousness a polite intimation was made to the Bishop of Hereford before wholly passing by Liberal Churchmen; but there is an air of Chinese formalism in this act of deference which makes it of small value, and there are at least three other Bishops any one of whom Liberals would have been glad to see really, not formally, transferred to the high duty of at once guiding Yorkshire Churchmen and standing as next in counsel with the Archbishop of Canterbury. But outside the Bench—and the promotion of a present member would have been the simplest procedure followed by the selection of a new man for the see to be vacated—we have data for regarding it as fairly certain that there are at least two thousand of the clergy whose sympathies and thoughts are Liberal. And it is also fairly certain that this group contains the great majority of the Church's leading scholars, and includes some of the most effective parish clergy.

This group, which we should not at all allow to be regarded as on the confines of the Church, but would rather claim to be its central line, has been persistently ignored during the long Premierships of Mr. Gladstone, Lord Salisbury, and Mr. Balfour: and now it is ignored again. What wonder, therefore, if the ordinary Church layman has come to look upon the men whom it contains as unadapted for official positions: as irregulars or territorials, as it were, whom it is not wise to entrust with responsible commands? They see on the Bench of Bishops only three or four men of this type, and two of these appointed so long ago as to be now regarded as superannuated when a higher office falls vacant. And similarly in the various offices of the Church throughout. The consequence is most inimical to the progressive spirit: Liberal laymen have largely ceased to enter into active co-operation with Church work; they do not attend the congresses or the diocesan or ruri-decanal conferences; and even in the public worship of the Church their abstention is becoming more and more marked, to the universal regret. But some of us believe that this is temporary; only, we ask, when is the change to begin? We know that there is a very large number of religious Churchmen who would like to take a more active part in the beneficent work of the Church, according to their opportunities, and who are waiting, more or less consciously, but not very hopefully, for the time when that work will be animated by ideas more congenial and more in correspondence with the spirit of the times as they understand its tenor and temper.

The effect of the continued ignoring of the Liberal clergy by their being kept from positions of influence is seen in several ways. If we look at the Bench of Bishops we see what we may call the Cabinet of the Church—thirty-seven in number—mainly composed of Churchmen of a distinctively stationary type of mind. Under such a Cabinet the participation of the Church in the progress of the times is likely to be prevented—and facts are at hand to show that it has been prevented. The late Pan-Anglican Congress (of clergy and laity) was needed before the Lambeth Conference (of Bishops) could widen its view in certain very important directions—a widening in which the English Bishops should have been leaders, and not followers. Doubtless there is a common feeling that Bishops should not be in the vanguard; but at least they should not have to be drawn along ignominiously in the rear. But there is no valid reason why Bishops should not be in the van: the great names of Theodore and Anselm, and later of Tillotson and Westcott and Creighton, are not the names of rearguard men, and such leaders, in their several capacities, the Church might expect the majority of her Bishops to be. And we cannot have a Cabinet of leaders unless the members of it are in their personal convictions and habits of mind men who are really in front of the rank and file. It might have been hoped that the tenure of the selecting office by Liberal Prime Ministers would have been a time for securing this. What has taken place is, in detail, this: one Liberal clergyman has been placed on the Bench, but has been despatched for his episcopal work to a remote rural county (Cornwall); one, distinctly a rearguard man, has been sent to the progressive diocese of Newcastle; one of a more progressive mind has been remitted to a small island (Sodor and Man); and now a representative of the already predominant group, due to the Gladstone-Cecil régimes, is selected for Yorkshire and the Primacy of the North.

Then there is the effect on the great body of the clergy. We do not speak, of course, of those to whom promotion means satisfaction of personal aspirations after dignity, but of those to whom a large and important parish differs from a small one by reason of its scope for influence and work. The Bishops have the responsibility of selecting from the clergy those who are to occupy a very considerable proportion of the important parishes, and a still larger proportion of offices which in various ways influence the pastoral work of the Church. As men of conviction the Bishops cannot but appoint with greatest cordiality and finest exercise of judgment the men with whom they sympathise most. Exceptions they will make from time to time, but the general course of their selections cannot but be guided by their own affinities. Thus it is that the color of each Bishop is thrown effectively over the diocese placed under his direction. And so we find, as plain matter of fact, very few Liberal clergy in prominent positions; and as a matter of opinion to which we challenge attention, the remission to obscurity of men of marked intellectual ability among their fellows, and of no less personal piety and general capacity for pastoral work.

And, lastly, there is the effect upon thoughtful young men. It is notorious that at the Universities it has become quite exceptional for the young men of highest attainment to take holy orders. It is slightly better now than it was twenty years ago, we are glad to think; but the refusal is very marked. The minute number of Fellows of the Colleges most distinguished for mental ability—say Balliol or New, at Oxford, Trinity or St. John's, at Cambridge—who have taken holy orders within the last thirty years is a depressing fact for Churchmen to take note of. What these young men feel is, first, that the theology of the Universities is barely in line with the theological ideas of the open world, especially when Germany and Scotland are taken into view; and, second, that between the theology of the Universities and that of the Bishops, Archdeacons, and Rural Deans of the Church there is a still wider gap. They go from college to their homes in their vacations, and find the parish clergy immersed in excellent activities, but remote from even the University stage of theological opinion, and so any rising thoughts of the possibility of making the Church's Ministry their field of activity die down. Canon Henson courageously drew attention to this in the University pulpit at Cambridge a few Sundays ago. No one who knows the Universities can question it. And if this is so in the older Universities, where tradition is strong and deep-reaching, where is the chance for the Church winning the young men in the new Universities, where the beginning has yet to be made? And of these new Universities no less than five lie in that very North of England which has been treated in the depressing manner we are now deploring.

No one questions the entirely sincere desire of our Prime Ministers to discharge their duty in this great function of their high office. They have sought advice, we cannot doubt. But what we should like better now would be that a man of Mr. Asquith's education and character should be bolder in forming a judgment for himself; that he should not be afraid to give a place to the Liberal theology and the Liberal Churchmanship which he knows is a part of the real tradition of religion of Oxford, as it is of Cambridge; and, deeper still, of the Church of England herself taken over the whole course of her history.—Yours, &c.,

SUFFRAGISTS AND SUFFRAGETTES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The admirable fairness, logic, and lucidity with which in your article "Suffragists and Suffragettes" you have described and supported the policy of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, emboldens me to address you on a point of great importance on which you seem to me to be under some misapprehension. The Bill which we hope to see carried through Parliament does not deal with the existing basis of the franchise either from a democratic or a Conservative standpoint; it leaves the way of future reform absolutely open to the future decision of the electorate; it simply removes the disability of sex, and qualifies women to vote under whatever scheme of qualification now enables, or shall in future enable, men to vote. It cannot therefore be properly described as a Property Bill unless it be admitted that the only existing qualification for men voters is a property one; in which case future reform, if desired, will apply to women as to men citizens. But the strongest reason against the application of such a term to the proposed Bill lies in the facts as to what would be the proportion of working women as compared with women of property and professional women whom it would enfranchise. Mr. Philip Snowden has stated that at the request of his colleagues of the Independent Labor Party he "supervised a census which was taken in something like fifty different parts of the country, representative of every class of the population, with the object of ascertaining what proportion of women enfranchised by such a measure as this would belong to the working classes." The definition of "women of the working class" adopted for this purpose was "those who worked for wages, those domestically employed, and those who were supported by wage-earning children. The municipal registers were examined, and it was found that in the fifty districts there was a total of 372,000 electors, while the total number of women voters was 59,000, of whom 49,000, or about 82·4 per cent., were working women." I think on this question the authority of Mr. Philip Snowden may be taken as conclusive.

With sincere gratitude for your able advocacy,—Yours, &c.,

J. M. STRACHEY.

November 14th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—One can but wonder at THE NATION in its article on "Suffragists and Suffragettes," in the issue of November 14th, countenancing the assertion that, in demanding for women their admission to the franchise on the same terms as it is, or may be, granted to men, suffragists are asking for a Bill which will mainly affect "well-to-do women whose existence is largely free from the most depressing of material cares." The movement has been partially officered by such women, from obvious causes, but they and their class will not get a large proportion of the new votes.

Much confusion has arisen from the ambiguity in the popular mind of the term "propertied franchise." And the opposition to the "Limited Bill" on the part of working-men is mainly due to a misconception. A man starving with his family in a couple of rooms, just able to keep off the rates, votes in virtue of a "propertied franchise"—no other exists in England—but we do not usually look upon his vote as an example of the "super-endowment of property," to quote the words of the article.

Let us look at the facts.

Precise figures are not available, but certain approximate figures were accepted by both sides in the House of Commons debate on February 28th, and are likely to be fairly correct. It was there stated that the number of women to be enfranchised under Mr. Stanger's Bill would be about 2,000,000. Let us see how these would be distributed. First, as to the household franchise. An investigation carried out by the Independent Labor Party, in fifty districts chosen at random, brought out the fact that, if their results held good for the country taken as a whole, and there is no reason to suppose the contrary, Mr. Stanger's Bill would have given us 1,250,000 women voters, of whom 82·5 per cent. were working women. Another inquiry, conducted independently in districts of ten towns by the Lancashire and Cheshire Women's Textile Representation Committee, showed that out of a total of 4,752 women who had the municipal vote, all but 482 were dependent on their own earnings. These results will surprise no one conversant with Borough Council and Poor Elections. The women householders, averaging about one in six or seven, are the despair of the party agents, owing to the difficulty of capturing them in either of the party nets—and they are often the poorest of the poor.

Next comes the "service" franchise. Whatever the numerical value of this, it will be a working-class vote, and not a propertied one. Then comes the "lodger" qualification. It is an undoubted evil that, owing largely to the vagaries of the registration laws, many working-girls will still be deprived of their votes. Against this must be set the fact that the cotton workers of Lancashire gave Mr. Stanger's Bill enthusiastic support, knowing that it enfranchised a sufficiently large number of them, to make it worth their while. And what is true of the cotton workers must be true also of women in the woollen, tailoring, and pottery industries. Under the lodger vote, also, will come in that large class of women brain-workers who have sprung into existence during the last thirty years. It is impossible even to enumerate the categories under which they fall; elementary and secondary teachers, teachers of singing, cookery, and calisthenics, women in the Post Office and other branches of the Civil Service, designers and artists, journalists and writers, secretaries and lady clerks, trained nurses, business women of all kinds and degrees. No toilers have a harder struggle for life than have many of these women, but most of them manage to secure the luxury of a room to themselves, and thus would be qualified voters under the Bill. These brain-workers alone must outnumber the propertied women, and though, as in the case of the hand-workers, many would be disqualified under the present registration laws, as soon as these laws are altered, as they must be, for men, women will reap the advantage just as much as men will.

It is, indeed, somewhat difficult to credit the opponents of the Limited Bill with either sense or honesty when one considers that the only alternative put forward is universal suffrage. Let anyone candidly consider the figures. Roughly speaking, there are at present 7,000,000 voters; 3.000,000 men and 11,000,000 women who are non-voters. Can anyone seriously suggest that a Bill should be sent up to the Lords, proposing at the next General Election to swamp the present electorate by an inrush of new voters, absolutely devoid of any political experience, who would outnumber it in the proportion of two to one? Would not a protest rise from every constituency in the country; and would not such a protest be justified? A man may want his dinner, and yet fairly object to being choked by being forced to swallow his beefsteak whole.—Yours, &c.,

ANNA MARTIN.

November 18th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—There are points in your leading article of last Saturday on which I should like to write briefly. When, for instance, you say that "many women are disposed to exaggerate the practical uses of the vote," I cannot be sure what exaggeration you refer to, but I would remind you that the very first law passed in Finland after women obtained the franchise equalised the wages of women and men, and, I believe, similar laws have been passed in all the Australian States since women voted. Men's wages have steadily risen since the Reform Act of 1884, while women's have declined. The Sweating Commission, which strongly urged legislation twenty years ago in the matter of women's work, has had no result, for the reason that women cannot demand legislation.

You are speaking of economic uses only, else I should include among "practical uses" alterations in the paternity and bastardy laws, and the law enacting that a woman has no property in her own children, unless they are illegitimate. There are many other cases. I can even imagine that, if women had the franchise, one of the Bishops last week might have plucked up courage to vote against the majority of the Lords when they retained the infamous death-sentence for cases of infanticide by deserted and distracted mothers.

I should also like to point out that when, speaking of the use of violence in politics, you say that before the Reform Bill of 1832, "some workmen burnt hayricks," you use hayricks in rather an extended sense, since they must include large parts of Bristol, Leeds, and Nottingham, custom-houses, toll-houses, prisons, bishops' palaces, and other public buildings. I need not remind you of the Hyde Park riots before the Reform Bill of 1867, or the Aston riots before the Bill of 1884, when Mr. Gladstone said that if no instructions had been issued to the people of this country in political crises save only to remember to hate violence and love order and exercise patience, the liberties of this country would never have been attained.

Again, there is your metaphor of the white flag. You compare the militant suffragists to a hostile army advancing under cover of the white flag. By the white flag I think you mean womanhood; and the comparison is apt, for when the suffragists advance under that flag they are immediately fired upon with the utmost cowardice. At their own meetings and demonstrations they are pelted with stones, filth, eggs, fruit, or anything that comes handy; at Liberal meetings they are dragged out, thrown down, beaten with sticks, kicked by stewards, or foully assaulted. One Cabinet Minister orders them to be "flung out ruthlessly," another Cabinet Minister cries, "Let the pot-boy follow the barmaid."

And for all the violence and insult with which their "white flag" has been received, not a single man has ever been given a day's punishment. A woman got two months' imprisonment for throwing a stone at a window; how many stones may a man throw at a woman for nothing? Women are shut up for months as common criminals for trying to take a petition to the House; how many free kicks may a Liberal steward give a woman for demanding the vote? The Home Office should answer these questions for the benefit of men in Accrington, Cardiff, Herne Bay, Maidstone, Mid Devon, Scarborough, Ealing, Paddington, and the City Temple, who like kicking women and throwing stones at them.

I am glad you speak of Mr. Asquith's statement of last May 20th in answer to the deputation of Liberal members as only "a half-opened door" to the suffrage. The statement was that the Government would not oppose an amendment to their possible Reform Bill, if the change were "on democratic lines," and "had behind it the support—the strong and undoubted support—of the women of the country, as well as of the present electorate." This is sometimes called a "pledge," but you are right in seeing that it is not a pledge on which any sane man or woman could advance sixpence. With those vague and impracticable conditions attached, it means little more than nothing. It is a half-opened door that could be slammed even by Mrs. Humphry Ward. And, indeed, Mr. Asquith himself slammed it only a week later when, in answer to Mr. Alfred Hutton, he called the Government's attitude "a contingent question with regard to a remote and speculative future."

As to "democratic lines," may I remind you that the demand to extend the franchise to women "on the same terms as men" is not specially Mrs. Pankhurst's proposal? It was the proposal of John Stuart Mill when he moved his amendment to the Reform Bill of 1867, and it is still the proposal of all the women's suffrage societies, I believe without exception. There are obvious objections to it, and it is adopted chiefly for its simplicity. But it is quite unfair to suggest that on this account "the 'suffragettes' are prepared to barter the cause of the working women for a property franchise." Everyone who knows the Women's Social and Political Union knows that nearly, if not quite, all its members come from the Liberal or Labor Parties; and anyone who has read Mrs. Pankhurst's speech from the dock in her recent trial knows that the Union's first object is to secure justice for working women. It is difficult to calculate exactly, but if the franchise were granted to women on the same terms as men, Mr. Keir Hardie's return gives 82·45 as the percentage of working women voters. Even if it were less, it would not necessarily be disastrous to democracy, or to the Liberal Party.

What will be disastrous to the Liberal Party is blindness to the present situation, and want of courage in meeting it; besides that want of temper which gives the action of the Home Office an appearance of vindictiveness. Such a prospect is very ominous to men like myself, who still regard a strong and popular Liberal Party as the best hope for the country; indeed, as the only immediate hope.—Yours, &c.,

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have read with much interest the article in this week's NATION on "Suffragists and Suffragettes." I agree with so much of it that I am anxious to be allowed to correct one misapprehension under which your contributor seems to labor.

I am a constitutional suffragist and hold no brief for the Women's Social and Political Union, but it is due to them to say that their object—the enfranchisement of women on the same terms as men—does not imply "the super-endowment of property."

On the contrary, a Bill framed on these lines (such as Mr. Stanger's last spring) would enfranchise about a million women; and careful calculations based on the state of the manufacturing population of the North show that of this million eighty-two per cent. would be working women. I submit that a movement to enfranchise eight hundred and twenty thousand workers cannot be regarded simply as a movement in favor of well-to-do women.—Yours, &c.,

BARMAIDS AND THE LICENSING BILL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—May I, though late, refer to your leader on the above subject? The decision of the House on the proposed legislation regarding barmaids was doubtless due to a misconception of what the effect of empowering the Justices to make conditions for barmaids' employment would be. It suited the Trade, and those working for it, to allege that wholesale dismissals would be the result. What will really happen when this legislation is carried (as it surely will be eventually) is that the Justices will be enabled to stand between the grasping employer and a peculiarly helpless class of women workers, and insist on decent hours and conditions for them. If the barmaids themselves could have spoken, they would have strongly advocated the legislation proposed. It was their misfortune that a body to which hardly any of them belong, and which was not working for their interests, could not be prevented from noisy interference.

It will be noticed that no representative body of any kind, and hardly any person of note, opposed the now defunct clause. There is little doubt that the country is ripe for such legislation; and it is even probable that the present House of Commons would have been so if time had been given members to realise the true bearings of the proposal.—Yours, &c.,

"PERSONAL SERVICE AMONG THE LONDON POOR."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—On reading the paragraph in your last issue on the new organisation for "personal service among the London poor," I rubbed my eyes, and turned to see if I had taken up "The Spectator" instead of The Nation. But to my surprise, I found it was your paper which expressed sympathy with a form of benevolence which, while veiled in quasi-democratic words, is really a revival of old-fashioned class methods.

Apart from the fact that poor districts are already often over-"visited" by religious and other organisations, doing their best to meet distress and create friendships, can anyone really believe that the way to establish "natural and human relations" is by organised visits of rich individuals to poor families? The unreasonableness of such an idea is at once seen when the complementary action (which could alone make a natural and human friendship) is suggested of an ill-clad, starving woman paying a call in a luxurious drawing-room, to sympathise with a rich woman in her sorrow on the death of her husband or child. The inaugurators of the scheme show, indeed, how unreal to them the words in their letter are, for they go on to speak of "cases" and "expert supervision," which are hardly the terms of brotherly love.

The proposed organisation reminds one in its character of those unwholesome societies for children, which prescribe an act of kindness a day, and arrange for a rich child to be a "sunbeam" in the life of a poor child.

The only way in which the more fortunate and better educated can put themselves on fairly satisfactory terms of helpful and "natural" friendship with the workers, and receive their real and full confidence, is by entering the ranks of their own movements, and working side by side with them. Anyone who has worked in the co-operative, trade union, or Socialist movements, receiving and giving the common hospitalities of life as a co-worker, knows how an entirely different relation is established from that arising out of an artificial system of visiting.

But even with the great bond of common work, education in some cases creates barriers, making free and equal intercourse difficult to many; and we have to await the good time when class distinctions are obliterated by universal education, and the "hateful words rich and poor," as William Morris called them, no longer exist in our vocabulary. The truly "natural and human relationship" is seen where the personal service is of a nobly self-sacrificing kind, unknown, unconscious of itself, such as is daily rendered by the poor to each other. The penalty of the rich is that they are outcasts, and are cut off from natural and human relationships with the great mass of mankind.

For those who belong to the "upper" classes, "personal service" entailing sacrifices of a different and more difficult kind seem to be demanded. This is well brought out by Mr. Wells in "New Worlds for Old," when he says to the rich: "All this space, all this splendor, has its traceable connection with the insufficiencies and miseries from which you are so remote . . . they are the reverse side of that splendid fabric and no separate thing, the rich, wide tapestry of your lives comes through on the other side, stitch for stitch, in stunted bodies, in children's deaths, in privation and anger."

It is by hard work in searching out causes, and in the fearless acceptance of results, that the best help can be given and personal sacrifice made. The foundations on which refinement and luxury are built must be ruthlessly exposed. To help the unemployed we must face the facts that the effects of dislocations of industry should not fall on the workers, that high wages are more important to the nation than high profits, that production is checked by land monopoly, and that taxation of the poor hinders consumption, and so lessens employment.

The more thoughtful and advanced amongst the working-class look upon the proposed scheme with grave suspicion, and are astonished at seeing Mr. Henderson's name in such company. I have received interesting criticisms from this point of view from three women—two of whom have worked in factories till recently at wages of 14s. and 18s. a week. One of them says: "Its success might be for the worse in the long run, as any such palliative would be snatched at by the Government as giving them another chance of shirking their responsibilities." Another says: "It is something to keep the people quiet"; while the third in saying she "fears the move suggested is one to undermine and destroy the possibility of Socialism gaining a stronger hold on the workers of the country," says also: "My idea of personal service, as from the wealthy to the poor, is to educate them to a sense of their responsibility as citizens, to acknowledge their right to work, see they are paid a living wage, and not the dispensation of charity."

Such a scheme as that proposed would have various harmful results. It would turn the desire to help from serious thought and action to illusory and sentimental palliatives. We usually find that the ordinary philanthropist is a firm opponent of far-reaching reforms. It would act as an anodyne to the individual and social conscience. Indiscriminate giving could not be avoided, for when anyone actually sees a lack of bread, words alone cannot be offered.

That the poor in their turn should come to rely on gifts of either money or work from rich individuals undermines their growing sense of solidarity, and responsibility to their fellow-workers. The charity of the rich inevitably leads to deception—a deception which is really the result of our unequal conditions of life, causing the poor, with no feeling of wrong-doing, to consider the rich "fair game." This attitude of the poor towards the rich is well explained in your sympathetic article last week called "The Thoughts of the Poor." On the other hand, suspicion is engendered in the visitor, and far from increasing "natural and human relationships," and understanding of the problem of the poor, the gulf between classes is widened.

Instead of inaugurating a system of amateur visiting of the East End by the West End, it would have been far more helpful to have had an organisation of the wealthy to press for the development of distress committees, so that the resources and methods of these committees might be more effective in relieving temporary distress, until the problem of unemployment is scientifically dealt with. Robust thought, a burning sense of the wrongs and injustices suffered, courageous action, regardless of class feeling, in working for reforms, are what is needed. Out of these will come, naturally, opportunities for personal deeds of kindness.—Yours, &c.,

DISPUTED POINTS IN THE OLD AGE PENSIONS ACT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Up and down the country two thousand Pension Sub-Committees are deciding the claims of applicants to Old Age Pensions. From information received from different parts of the country, it appears that very many points of difficulty have already arisen, and that these are being decided by Pension Sub-Committees and Committees in very diverse ways. The Pension Officers themselves, notwithstanding their elaborate book of instructions which the Government conceals from us, are deciding claims in quite opposite ways in different districts. It is, we fear, certain that no small amount of injustice and hardship will be done. For these poor old people often cannot wait for the leisurely procedure under which, it may be assumed, a few years' decisions of the three separate Local Government Boards will have produced a well-known and consistent code. What appears urgent, if many of the claimants are not to die before their cases are decided, is that every disputed point should be instantly raised by way of appeal. And we must not throw the onus of appeal on the poor old folk, who have not the means, the skill, or the knowledge for it. The Executive Committee of the Fabian Society therefore suggests, to the 18,000 members of the Pension Sub-Committees and Committees, that they ought to decide against the Pension Officer in every case in which there is a point which needs to be settled by appeal, in order that he may be able promptly to get an authoritative decision which will clear up the matter.

Among the points of dispute already reported to the Fabian Society—points decided against the applicant in many cases, though in other districts he has rightly been given the benefit of the doubt—are the following. Any case involving one of these points should be decided against the Pension Officer, in order to enable him to appeal.

I.—INCOME.

There is no authoritative definition yet of what may be included as income. If (as appears to be the better opinion) the definition of the Income-tax Acts should be followed, there ought not to be included as income:—

(a) Voluntary gifts or allowances of any kind. (Unless there is a legally binding engagement to give them, they are not income.)

(b) Board. Pension Officers are claiming to reckon this at the most varying figures. Under the Income-tax Acts it is not legally income at all.

(c) Lodging. This, too, is not income for purposes of the Income-tax Acts, unless there is a separate occupation of a distinctly assessed tenement.

(d) Temporary receipts. Only the amount actually received in the year may be reckoned (e.g., £1 per week, for six months only, does not disqualify).

(e) Husband or wife's income. Here the better opinion seems to be that the joint income should be divided by two. Thus, if the husband has £40 a year and the wife nothing, both are probably entitled to pension.

(f) Furniture. A percentage (which ought not to be more than 4 per cent.) on the value in excess of £30 should alone be taken.

(g) Money in savings bank. It has been claimed that the applicant should be held to be bound to invest this more profitably than at 2½ per cent., or even that what he could get by sinking it in an annuity should be reckoned: there is no legal warrant for these suggestions. Only the interest actually earned may be taken.

(h) Allowances from friendly societies. Some Pension Officers are claiming to take these at their gross amount, and are not allowing (as they should do) the weekly contributions to be deducted.

II.—DISQUALIFICATION BY RECEIPT OF POOR RELIEF SINCE 1ST JANUARY, 1908.

On this merely temporary disqualification, which is only to last until 31st December, 1910, there are a whole crop of points in doubt, on which the Pension Officer should be enabled to appeal to the Local Government Board.

(a) Husband entitled to pension, but for the fact that his wife has had poor relief (doubtful).

(b) Wife entitled to pension, but for the fact that the husband has received poor relief. This case should be certainly given in favor of the applicant.

(c) Applicant has had poor relief, but has repaid it.

(d) Applicant held by Pension Officer to be disqualified merely because he has entered the workhouse. This is not a valid ground for disqualification: the poor relief must be stated not to be medical relief.

(e) Applicant entered the poor-law infirmary, or the workhouse, by order of the District Medical Officer, in order to be treated for some ailment; and left the institution as soon as cured. This is certainly medical relief only; and does not disqualify.

(f) Applicant carried into workhouse suffering from accident; and left as soon as cured. This is certainly medical relief, and does not disqualify.

(g) (In Scotland) applicant was admitted to the poorhouse on certificate by the Parish Doctor that he was suffering from a complaint. It is very doubtful whether, in Scotland, all such admissions are not legally included under medical relief.

(h) Applicant was sent by Board of Guardians to a voluntary hospital for treatment, and a payment made for him out of the poor rate. This is probably medical relief.

III.—DISQUALIFICATION BY MARRIAGE.

(a) Applicant, a woman English-born, has married an unnaturalised alien. Held to be disqualified; though in Australia her right to a pension under similar circumstances is allowed. The case should be raised on appeal.

(b) Englishwoman herself always resident in England; has married an Australian-born man, who came to England only ten years ago. She is qualified for a pension.

In all such cases let the Pension Officer appeal!—Yours, &c.,

EDWARD R. PEASE,
Secretary of the Fabian Society.

THE BISHOPS AND THE DEATH PENALTY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—With the past record of the Bishops' votes in mind, no great surprise will be felt that not a single Bishop came forward to support the proposal of the Lord Chancellor to give the judge in cases of infanticide power to pass a less sentence than death. Mr. Gladstone has recently stated that in all ordinary cases of this kind the practice of the Home Office is to reduce the penalty to a maximum of three years' imprisonment. It did not require very great courage on the Bishops' part, therefore, to vote for releasing from the penalty of death the unfortunate girl-mothers who, like the girl sentenced at the Central Criminal Court last week, commit this crime "in a state of frenzy." But the Bishops are great believers in hanging, it would seem. Ever since 1810, when seven Bishops voted against abolishing the death penalty for stealing to the value of five shillings, and none in favor, they have always opposed any reduction in the use of hanging.

Lord Russell, it appears from the Press, voted against Lord Loreburn because he objected to the fact that the amendment did not abolish the penalty, but only made it optional, at the discretion of the judge. Knowing that he would have had the support of every humane and reasonable person in the country, would it not have been more to the point to have moved an amendment in the sense he desired.

The best thing that can be done now is to press forward Mr. George Greenwood's Law of Murder Amendment Bill which it is to be hoped the Government will take up.—Yours, &c.,

"THE BACCHANALS."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I correct a small point in your interesting article upon "The Bacchae"? Your contributor says, with reference to the performance at the Court Theatre: "By his arrangement of the final scene, Professor Gilbert Murray appears to insist upon" a certain interpretation. I should like to say that I have had nothing whatever to do with the production of "The Bacchae" at the Court Theatre. In all previous representations of my translations of Greek plays, I have regularly attended the rehearsals and taken joint responsibility with the producer, but in this case circumstances have prevented my doing so. I merely gave permission for two performances. The whole responsibility for the production and interpretation rests with Mr. William Poel.

There are also some verses quoted in the article in a manner which might imply that they are mine when they are not.

I am sorry to trouble your readers with a trifle; but it seems as if "The Bacchae" had an uncanny power of making people write letters to you in correction of one another.—Yours, &c.,

GILBERT MURRAY.

NEW CROSBY HALL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The materials of Crosby Hall, stored, by the courtesy of the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China, for re-erection upon some appropriate site, have been accepted by the London County Council, in consequence of their approval of the project submitted by us for the renewal and utilisation of the fabric. This, when re-erected here upon the garden of the most illustrious of its former owners—Sir Thomas More—will be transferred by us, along with the site, in perpetuity to the London County Council, subject to a 500 years' lease to this first Collegiate Hall of Residence officially recognised by the University of London, access for the public being at the same time provided for.

This re-erection is not merely a matter of archæological piety, nor by any means of the dubious antique. It is the utilisation of a treasure otherwise lost, and a renascence of its beauty, in conditions historically appropriate, architecturally harmonious, and educationally useful. The scheme thus appeals not only to academic sympathies, but to civic and public interests. It must attract not only those who seek for the student in whom they are immediately interested the advantages of the great city whilst guarding against its dangers, but all who recognise that the metropolitan and imperial University, now in so many ways entering upon unprecedented developments, should not continue to lack that collegiate life which has been so valuable and characteristic an element of the older English Universities.

We appeal even to those interested in education on its simpler levels, since every improvement of University conditions speedily reacts upon all others, yet with special confidence to those for whom the progress of London and its constituent boroughs, or the strengthening of the ties of the Empire and of civilisation, are paramount.

London, with its almost unparalleled resources, offers peculiar facilities for the post-graduate student from all other Universities. The sixty teaching institutions now linked together by the teaching University of London are spread over so wide an area that not a few boroughs are becoming University towns, even on a scale not inferior to those of America and the Continent, though almost without recognising it. Among these Chelsea, from its situation and its associations, from More and Erasmus to Carlyle, is peculiarly suitable as the centre of a further development, that of a collegiate city.

Our site admits of the erection of a residential college to accommodate about 100 students and graduates; and its completion and equipment will involve a total outlay estimated at about £100,000. A sum of £5,000 has been received towards the re-erection of Crosby Hall, with a similar amount for general purposes; and smaller donations from £1,000 downwards have also been acknowledged. Thus a substantial nucleus of nearly £12,000 is already in hand. For the completion of Crosby Hall itself, with the adjacent library, &c., and for the first block of residential buildings, with their furnishing, equipment, &c., an additional sum of £30,000 is required, while the remainder will also be proceeded with as funds allow.

Donations may be forwarded to the Secretary (John Ross, C.A., 2, More's Garden, Cheyne Walk, S.W.); to the bankers (Messrs. Robarts, Lubbock & Co., 15, Lombard Street, E.C.); or to any of the undersigned. Full printed particulars will also be forwarded on application.

We are, Sir, your obedient servants,

WE have received several letters enclosing cheques on behalf of the writer who described his sufferings as an unemployed cabinet-maker in our last week's issue. We have communicated with him, and he informs us that he has now some work, and that he would not like to take the money as a gift. But as he has only the clothes in which he stands and no underclothing, he would like to borrow the money offered if our correspondents would lend it, as this would help him to get some clothes. He adds: "When I wrote the article I wrote it as an article, hoping to earn a little, not as an appeal for charity. I appreciate your kindness, and the kindness of your correspondents. I have not met with so much kindness in my life before." We shall assume, if our correspondents do not reply, that they are willing that the sums sent to us should be lent to our correspondent.

THE CHURCH.

HERE stand I
Buttressed over the sea!
Time and sky
Take no toll from me.

To me, grey,
Wind-grey, flung with foam,
Ye that stray
Wild-foot, come ye home!

Mother, I—
Mother I will be!
Ere ye die,
Hear! O sons at sea!

Shall I fall,
Leave my flock of graves?
Not for all
Your rebelling waves!

I stand fast—
Let the waters cry!
Here I last
To Eternity!

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE revised edition of Mr. Arthur Symons's book on "Plays, Acting, and Music," announced by Messrs. Constable, has been postponed, but we learn that Mr. Symons has finished a work upon the English romantic poets. This book, which some of those who have seen it in manuscript say is Mr. Symons's finest critical effort, attempts to pass definite judgment upon the chief romantic poets, as well as to estimate the place and influence of romanticism in English literature. Although Mr. Symons has won distinction as a poet, his best work, in our view, is his criticism. His impressionist method may often provoke dissent, but he always shows insight, and a true sense of style and feeling for beauty. It was by a volume of criticism, "An Introduction to the Study of Browning"—a work which won Pater's admiration—that Mr. Symons first entered the world of letters just twenty-two years ago.

MESSRS. CONSTABLE are about to issue an edition, with illustrations, to be called "The Penshurst Edition," of Professor Arber's "An English Garner." The collection was first made, during the thirteen years from 1877 to 1890, out of the rare materials in Professor Arber's private collection, supplemented by reprints of virtually unique books in ancient libraries. Its object was, in Professor Arber's words, "to gather, for the gratification of these and future ages, a vast amount of incomparable poesy and most stirring prose, which hardly anyone would imagine to be in existence at all." In a later issue all the material was rearranged and classified, while introductions by scholars of eminence in each department were prefixed to the volumes. "The Penshurst Edition" will contain many illustrations and facsimiles, and promises to be in every way an adequate presentation of this fascinating collection.

THE translation of Erckmann-Chatrian's principal novels, which Mr. Dent is to include in his "Everyman's Library," will introduce to English readers of the present generation a number of tales that once had a great vogue, but have now almost passed out of notice. Both Erckmann and Chatrian were Lorrainers, and the scenes of most of their stories are laid in Alsace and Lorraine. Their descriptions of provincial life are excellent, and it would be hard to find more graphic pictures of the rank and file of Napoleon's armies than are to be found in such books as "Histoire d'un Conscrit de 1813" and "Waterloo." Their best work, "Les Deux Frères," only wants style to make it a great novel. Edmond About described their method of collaboration by saying that "the two friends see each other at rare intervals, and meet only to elaborate the scheme of a story. Erckmann then writes it, and Chatrian either corrects it or puts it in the fire."

A VOLUME containing some interesting reminiscences of Napoleon will be published next week in Paris. This is the "Journal" of Count Rœderer, a Minister and member of the Council of State before the fall of the Empire. It has been edited by M. Maurice Vitrac, of the Bibliothèque Nationale, and contains a selection from Napoleon's obiter dicta, which Count Rœderer noted in his diary. One of the most characteristic is the following: "I love power, but I love it as an artist. I love it in the same way as a musician loves his violin. I love it because I enjoy drawing sounds, chords, and harmonies from it. I love it as an artist."

THOSE who desire a guide at once trustworthy and entertaining through a fascinating bye-path of literary history cannot do better than obtain "The Secrets of our National Literature," by Mr. W. P. Courtney, which Messrs. Constable have just issued. "The pleasure," as Mr. Courtney observes, "of finding out the secrets of our neighbors appeals to most minds"; and this pleasure is undoubtedly heightened for the book-lover when it is the case of an author who either withholds his name or disguises it under a pseudonym. Some of the reasons put forward for taking pseudonyms are not without interest. Thus Mary Ann Evans called herself "George Eliot" because the first word was her husband's Christian name, and "Eliot" was a "fine, short, full-sounding name that matched her style and story." The three Brontë sisters called their small volume "Poems by Currer, Ellis, and Acton Bell" because they felt "a sort of conscientious scruple at assuming Christian names positively masculine, while we did not like to declare ourselves women, because, without at the time suspecting that our mode of writing and thinking was not what is called feminine, we had a vague impression that authoresses are liable to be looked on with prejudice." How sound this instinct was may be judged from the fact that when "Jane Eyre" appeared, Lockhart wrote that "it must be, if not by a man, by a very coarse woman." Even Kingsley, while describing the book as "worth fifty Trollopes and Martineaus rolled into one counterpane with fifty Dickenses and Bulwers to keep them company," thought the author to be "rather a brazen miss." Charles Merivale's letter to his sister proving that the author was a woman has the following shrewd sentence: "It is by a woman, because the men's faces are described so intensely—by a young woman, and not a very refined one, from a certain want of acquired delicacy—by a governess, for the governess scenes are the most naturally and easily written—by an acquaintance of Mr. Thackeray's."

HANNAH MORE'S first work, "Thoughts on the Importance of the Manners of the Great to General Society," appeared anonymously because she "hoped it might be attributed to a better person." One wonders whether she was satisfied or disappointed when public opinion hesitated between Bishop Porteus, Hayley, and William Wilberforce. Cowper inclined for Wilberforce, but was quite sure the book was by "some man intimately acquainted with the subject, a gentleman, and a man of letters." Hannah More, however, soon became too great a personage to be bettered by any bishop, and we may suppose that the copy of her "Sacred Dramas" which she presented to Mr. Gladstone in 1815, had her name upon its title page. Her collected works run to nineteen volumes, and Mr. Birrell tells us that he bought them all "neatly bound and lettered on the back" for eight shillings and sixpence. The nineteen volumes were destined to pass out of circulation, for wanting room in his library and despairing of any other means of ridding himself of them, Mr. Birrell buried them in his garden.

MME. VINCENS, who died in Paris on Saturday last, was better known by her pseudonym, Arvède Barine, under which name she published lives of Alfred de Musset, Bernardin de St. Pierre, La Grande Mademoiselle, and several volumes of essays. She was a regular contributor to the "Revue des Deux Mondes" and the "Journal des Débats," where she did much to keep French readers acquainted with the tendency of English and German literature. Her book "Névroses" is an excellent study of the morbid in literature.

Thomas Bailey Aldrich—one seems to remember the name! And here he is, a capital likeness, a country gentleman and a major of Volunteers, for sure. But no, for here on the title is an elaborate Ionic fortress—no, temple, a kind of Athenæum. The entablature bears the name of the illustrious Aldrich. In the doorway leading in to the penetralia, suspended hover the talismanic words, "Ferris Greenslet." And a suave yet stentorian, but, above all, compelling, voice utters the mystic formula, "Come in." "He was a lover of life," urges Mr. Greenslet. No doubt! but why so much mystery about a minor American poet who came, we are assured, of good Colonial stock? He was born at Portsmouth in 1836, and his birthplace is now the Aldrich Memorial Museum. In other respects, "Tom Bailey" was not exactly a record-breaker, but he was a Bohemian poet in New York in the 'fifties when they wrote like this:—

"Fannie wears an open dress,
Ah! the charming chemisette!
Half concealing, half revealing,
Something far more charming yet."

And William, or rather, Thomas, Bailey dressed the part like a Russian novelist. Nathaniel P. Willis, Stoddard, Stedman, Bayard Taylor, Curtis, Halleck, George P. Morris, Henry Clapp, jun., F. S. Cozzens, and other genial journalists of yester-year whose fun the author summarises succinctly as "capital," twirled and spun gaily in this literary Bohemia, none more prismatically than Tom Bailey Aldrich, and none poeticised more freely than he, all unconscious of his doom in later years to play the Herod to his own early offspring. In these surroundings, punctuated by an occasional sonnet from Bayard Taylor, Aldrich's "Annus Mirabilis" drew on apace. It was in 1865 that he was invited to edit "Every Saturday," married, and moved from New York to be "Boston-plated." He had now "kicked up all the dust" he intended to, and had come to Boston to stay. The story henceforth is on familiar lines, as familiar, that is to say, as the career of an American can be to a stay-at-home Englander—so near and yet so far! We are among the "old familiar faces" (see the list of illustrations). In the very next room to our hero in Park Street sate that white American, W. D. Howells, learning to edit the "Atlantic" from James T. Fields, as Fields had learned from Lowell, and Lowell (some say) from Underwood. And that an editor's chair in Boston was and is a good thing for a man to sit in is the burden of this book—a sentiment in which we heartily concur; and well, indeed, has Mr. Greenslet proved his case. Living in a coy little house (too soon to be exchanged for a very superior mansion), which might have been imported from Chelsea and known as "Mrs. Aldrich's Workbox," there lived in the late 'sixties a happy poet, father of twins, historian of "A Bad Boy" and of "Marjorie Daw." In 1874, after a two years' sojourn in the poet-haunted halls of the Prince of Elmwood, Aldrich (off-saddled as editor for the time being) took a Sabine Farm at Ponkapog and to reading as a diversion from editing. At intervals he wrote delightful letters to his friends, full of quips and kindly feeling. "If you live to be two hundred years old," he begins one to Stedman—"and I should like to catch you at it!——" But, there, the letters are full of the prettiest dimples. It was obvious from the first to Mr. Houghton, and to the reader, that Aldrich was starred to edit "The Atlantic," and so, sure enough, it befell in 1881. How well he edited it may be gathered from this obiter dictum in a letter to Stedman: "The verse that pleases merely a set doesn't last like the verse that impresses a solitary reader here and there"; or from this extract from the communication of a correspondent: "The truth was, and is, that you did not read it nor even open the package. Therefore you could not judge its merits nor say, with truth, that you 'regretted to decline it.' You decline to apologise. My robust nature abhors your disgusting duplicity. You are a vulgar, unblushing Rascal, and an impudent, audacious liar. Which I am prepared to maintain anywhere, any time. You ought to be publicly horsewhipped. Nothing would gratify me more than to give you a sounder thrashing than any you have yet received. Moreover, I am determined that the Literary Public shall know what a putrid scoundrel and Liar you are." The robust nature was invited to but shirked the encounter that here seems so closely imminent.

Aldrich's interest was first and always Literature, and perhaps no editor of the "Atlantic" has printed more of it. During his tenure of office the afterglow of the great day of New England literature was fading, but fading slowly. "He could count on occasional poems from Longfellow, Holmes, Whittier, and Lowell, to say nothing of the younger group headed by Sill. He had Parkman and Fiske for historical papers, James, Helen Hunt Jackson, Miss Murfree, Mrs. Oliphant, Marion Crawford, Miss Jewett, and the two Hardys, American and English, for fiction. He developed the critical department of the magazine to a high degree of competence by marshalling what has seldom been seen in this country, a thoroughly compact and capable coterie of critical reviewers. This group, which was composed of Richard Grant White, G. E. Woodberry, George Parsons Lathrop, Horace Scudder, and Miss Harriet Waters Preston, contributed a surprisingly large proportion of the material that is embodied in the score of volumes of his editing. Read to-day, after the lapse of twenty years, it is still remarkable for penetration of insight and felicity of expression. It was under Aldrich, too, that the 'Atlantic' won its international reputation as being, in the phrase of an English review,* 'the best edited magazine in the English language.'" The work is such as might be described as pleasantly stimulating to the intelligence, and yet (such is the "side" of these editors), in 1895, we find him complaining to Woodberry, "I am naturally intellectual, but editorial work and accidental reading of dialect poems and stories have come near to extinguishing the white light of reason." To such good purpose did he edit that he was twice enabled to put a girdle round the earth and to invoke Browning (who talked "not so well as Lowell") and Rudyard Kipling, into whose language he meditated turning "The Eve of St. Agnes" thus:—

"St. Hagnes Heve! 'ow bloomin' chill it was!
The Howl, for all his hulster, was a-cold,
The 'are limped tremblin' thro' the blarsted grass. . . ."

"Apropos of Browning," he said, "I've been reading his letters to 'Ba' and 'Ba's' letters to him, and think it a shameful thing that they should be printed. All that ponderous love-making—a queer mixture of Greek roots and middle-age stickiness ('Ba' was forty years old)—is very tedious. Here and there is a fine passage, and one is amused by the way the lovers patronise everybody they don't despise. But as a whole the book takes away from Browning's dignity. A man—even the greatest—cannot stand being photographed in his pajahmas."

The lines of these literary Bostonians are invariably cast in the most enviable places. Sabbatical years abroad and such well set up country houses at home! They were lapped in humor, too, with Twain, Stockton, Aldrich, and the Little Doctor, not to speak of Lowell; and Aldrich gave jokes every bit as good as he took. When Holmes was capping answers and put the question to Aldrich, "What would you do if one day on Mount Vernon Street you were to meet a cannibal?" it was Aldrich who overcame him by replying, "Why, I should stop and pick an acquaintance." Asked once by a Boston revising magistrate his name and occupation, and, further, if he could read, he was given the Declaration of Independence and told to "Read thot." "Begorra," said Aldrich, "I will. 'Whin in the coorse of human ivints—'" He was incontinently allowed to register. A successful plea for benefit of Irishry! And here is good critical insight in one who could never speak calmly about Whitman: "Emerson and Whittier are about the only men in that famous [New England] group who were not thinking about themselves the whole while. They were too simple to pose or to be intentionally brilliant. Emerson shed his silver, like the moon, without knowing it." A great merit in the life of these people, we think, is the fact that they kept a warm place in their hearts for minor poets. The Americans deserved their great race because they made much of their second-rate poetry, realising that the twilight of poetry may often be far better for the run of men than the most dazzling prose. In such a world, down to the beginning of last year, Aldrich lived a happy life, clouded towards the close by such natural sorrows as serve, perhaps, to make the dark passage easier. He is shown to so much advantage in Mr. Greenslet's book that, however reluctant to make his acquaintance at the beginning, one is decidedly loth to part with him at the close.

TWO MINOR BOURBON MARTYRS.*

If one may judge by the number of books published during the last year or so, the two subjects that are now of most interest for the British public, apart from fiction, are the rival Bourbon and Napoleonic dynasties. There has never been a year within living memory when the outpouring of Napoleonic literature has not been considerable, but books on the Bourbon family and on the great ladies of their Court have been equally in evidence of late. We recently devoted much space to a review of Miss Catherine Welch's "Little Dauphin." The same subject is treated at even greater length in the book before us, "The King Who Never Reigned." There have been many "kings who never reigned"—our Edward V., for example. A hundred and seventy pages of the volume are devoted to a reprint of an old memoir of little Louis XVII. by Eckard, another eighty pages are given over to the memoir of Naundorff, one of the many sham Louis the Seventeenths. He first published his own story in 1836. The last hundred pages are the essential feature of the book, this is to say, that here we have Joseph Turquan's "New Light Upon the Fate of Louis XVII." We should have been disposed to give a greater welcome to this pamphlet had it appeared by itself. Apart from Turquan's narrative, one may concede that there is some good work by the editors, Maurice Vitrac and Arnould Galopin, who have since edited with considerable skill de Fayet's "Duc d'Enghien." Turquan's "New Light" is well known to French readers. It is an able summary of an interesting case. Eckard's "Memoir" of the young prince is merely an old-fashioned and conventional narrative written from an ultra-royalist standpoint. Naundorff's "Memoir" is a piece of cheap impudence, which, as the editors of this volume wisely inform us, bears upon the face of it the stamp of imposture. M. Turquan is interesting because he has a point of view which he elaborates with considerable skill, though not, we think, with conviction. The question at issue, as we have recently stated, is the fate of the young Prince. Did he die in the Temple, aged ten, a natural death on June 12th, 1795, physically wrecked, it may be, by the brutality and cruelty of his jailors? Did he escape to become one of the numerous claimants who startled Europe during the following thirty years, variously estimated by different historians as twenty-five, forty, and even two hundred in number—claimants of whom Eleazer Williams, who is ignored by our editors, was by far the most famous in America, and Naundorff, Méves, and Richemont, the most famous in Europe. M. Turquan accepts neither of these hypotheses, and the second is utterly untenable; but with great ability he works out the theory that the young Dauphin was strangled in the Temple on January 19th, 1794, about a year after his father was guillotined, and that his bones were there observed seven years later by the Marquis D'Andigné, a French general imprisoned in the Temple in the time of the Consulate. For the young Dauphin a dumb and sickly child was substituted, and it was that child who died in the Temple in June, 1795, his sister, Madame Royale, as revealed in her "Memoirs," believing, as did all who were not in the secret, that this was the actual Prince. Our space does not allow us to produce the chain of argument that Turquan brings in support of his theory, nor the many objections to its plausibility. In any case, Turquan's narrative makes interesting reading.

We tread much the same ground in Mrs. Maxwell Scott's "Madame Elizabeth de France." The author is of interest to us in that the blood of the great Sir Walter flows in her veins. She is doubtless attached to her heroine in that she recognises in Madame Elizabeth a co-religionist, who appears as the purest, serenest example of piety in that troublous time. The sister of Louis XVI. refused marriage that she might remain a daughter of France. She might more than once have fled across the frontier, as did her brothers Monsieur and d'Artois. Tied by sisterly devotion to the kindly, muddle-headed Louis, for her also were reserved the catastrophe of Varennes, the cruelties of the Temple, and death on the scaffold. Mrs. Maxwell Scott pretends to no original research. She quotes some ten authorities in her opening pages, and certain of these, as, for example, the books of M. Lenotre, are familiar to most of us. Her essential authors, however, are de Beauchesne's "Vie de Madame Elizabeth" and Feuillet de Conches' "Correspondence de Madame Elizabeth." The result is a well-told narrative, simple and sincere, if a little too full of the pietist predisposition which counts Mary Queen of Scots a saint and martyr. The author truly sees but one side of the shield. Many authoritative books would have given her the other. That it was the best of all possible worlds into which the Princess Elizabeth was born is no more tenable than the idea that Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette suffered only for the sins of the previous monarchs of France. No epigram has been more often quoted than that of Talleyrand concerning life before the Revolution, "Celui qui n'a pas vécu alors, n'a pas connu le plaisir de vivre," and not one is more deadly in its untruth. But Madame Elizabeth remains, notwithstanding her biographer's credulity as to certain episodes in her career, a veritable saint and martyr of the French Revolutionary epoch.

AN EAST AFRICAN RECORD.*

Bishop Tucker expressly warns us that these two large volumes are not a history of Uganda, but only a record of Episcopal missionary life. Certainly they are such a record, and to people whose special interest is in missions that will be an attraction. But to the ordinary layman, who admires the courage and devotion of the missionaries in Central Africa without any direct knowledge of their methods, the mission part of the book may be the least interesting. For the record of journeys to and fro, of ordinations, confirmations, and conversions becomes a little tedious when a good deal of it might have been concerned with the English Midlands. For ourselves we would give much of the diaries and all the very numerous quotations from hymns and poems to hear something more definite about the people themselves, and their manner of life and thought. There is a great amount of trivial detail that might also have been left out, and the work would have been twice as valuable at half the length. If, for instance, Bishop Tucker and all African travellers omitted to mention the fevers and other bodily discomforts they have suffered, what a quantity of printing would be saved! Might it not be taken for granted in future that everyone who travels in Central Africa will have fever, and will very likely die of that or something else? There is no need to say more. Anyone who loves Africa knows that fever, danger, and death are only a fair price for the joys of her wilderness.

But from Uganda the joys of the wilderness are fast disappearing, and the price to be paid grows less. The Bishop's book, besides being a mission record, contains the history of this remarkable change. When Dr. Tucker was consecrated to the charge in 1890, it was only five years since Hannington, the first bishop, had been executed by King Mwanga. His successor died early, and the interior was little known except to a few men like Robert Walker, Ashe, Mackay, and Pilkington, whose names have become familiar to students of African history. On his way to the Uganda capital, the new bishop found Emin Pasha still beside the great lake, unwilling to leave it, though his "rescue" by Stanley had been accomplished. Lugard and Sir Gerald Portal were in the country. Mwanga was absolute king, and three years were to pass before the Union Jack was hauled up in the presence of Portal, "Franky" Rhodes, "Roddy" Owen, and others who have left their mark upon the continent and now are gone. It then took six months for the vast caravan of carriers to reach the lake from the coast. Now it takes six days in a good train, with restaurant cars and everything found; not to speak of the steamer waiting to carry you over the lake to the capital. The converts then numbered a hundred or two. Now they are estimated at nearly 70,000, and the churches at over a thousand.

Much has been lost in the change, and many of the curses of civilisation have crept in. Dr. Tucker especially notices the increasing numbers of useless or scoundrelly whites, who find their way into the interior, and bring ruin to the natives or become a burden on the settlers. It is the same class that has done so much harm to South Africa, and, indeed, it is from South Africa they chiefly come. But when the worst has been said against the evils that the white man has brought with him, we must remember that only the year before the Bishop's arrival in Uganda a most savage and desolating slave trade had with difficulty been suppressed, and that even when conversions grew numerous, religion took the form of a bloodthirsty feud between the Protestant and Roman Catholic natives—English and French as they called themselves—far surpassing the old religious factions of Ulster in violence and slaughter. In describing this unhappy war of religions, the Bishop shows himself quite frankly a partisan, and attributes to the French Catholics sinister political aims; to which, probably, they would retort that the Protestant missionaries also had political aims that might have been called sinister had they not been successful.

We cannot here trace the history of those eighteen years of the Bishop's ministry from his first meeting with the savage Mwanga to his last journey, only a week or two ago, by train back to his flourishing diocese. If peace and commercial development are the chief objects of civilisation, the story of Uganda tells of unusual success. Even the railway, which surpassed all estimates by its cost of £5,500,000, seems likely to pay a fine dividend in time. At the present moment sleeping-sickness is the country's chief danger, as it is the danger of all Central Africa. In passing we may notice that Dr. Tucker attributes the name of this fatal disease to "the final stage of great drowsiness." But we gather he has not personally observed the patients. The final stage is not so much "great drowsiness" as about a fortnight of complete coma before death. The present writer, who has seen the disease in almost every stage, would attribute the name to its earliest symptom, which is really great drowsiness. This is followed by a gradual loss of control over the emotions and most of the spontaneous actions of the body, so that the patient laughs and cries without cause, and this stage continues for a long time till violent convulsions and twitching of the limbs supervene. But it appears unlikely that natives should have named the disease from its final stage (which as a rule is not reached for nine months) when an invincible desire to sleep is the invariable symptom of the first few weeks.

But whether the Bishop is right or wrong upon this medical point, no traveller in Africa will dispute the justice of the following piece of mental observation:—

> "One of the greatest trials which a missionary is called upon to endure as he fulfils his vocation, is the silent and subtle influence which contact with heathenism has upon his spiritual life. The danger of declension is a very real one. Unless he be continually upon his guard, the probability is that his spiritual sensibilities will become blunted."

That danger is not merely a question of heathenism and spiritual life. It threatens a man's whole moral and intellectual nature. It arises from an isolated existence among people of a widely different and perhaps lower stage of development. There is no need to recall the tragedy of the camp which Stanley left as his base, or even to remember Mr. Conrad's terrible story of the Heart of Darkness on the Congo. Everyone who has lived alone among African natives for some months at a time knows how rapid is the disintegration of all his standards of behaviour, of manners, and of intellect. Within a few weeks the change begins with a kind of moral drowsiness. A period of convulsive rage and uncontrolled passion or irritability usually supervenes, and it is a strong nature that resists the encroachment of the disease for nine months. In the end the higher side of personality is likely to pass into a condition of profound coma, and so the sleeping sickness of the soul has fulfilled its course.

A PROVINCIAL NOVEL.*

In reviewing Mr. Bennett's short stories more than a year ago, The Nation advised him to return to the matter and method of his "Anna of the Five Towns," which as a description of old-fashioned provincial life in the Potteries is a piece of work Balzacian in its human interest. We pointed out that when the provincial loses touch with his local types and local atmosphere and migrates to London, his artistic talent is usually frittered away in pleasing the fourth-rate tastes of Philistia. Mr. Bennett now responds with "The Old Wives' Tale," a novel of 578 pages, which traces the fortunes of the Baines, a Pottery tradesman's family, from the sixties to the present day. Both as a human document and a novel the book would have delighted the great French naturalists. Most novelists are rarely quite at one with their subject; a little above or below it, they enrich, romanticise, or impoverish it. But Mr. Bennett really is his subject, the breath of it, intellectually, in a remarkable way. By the miracle that befalls now and then when the spirit of an environment attains artistically a re-birth, and rises clamant in the spirit of a writer, the tone of our author's judgments, standards, and tastes seems to be the spiritual legacy of generations of level-headed, commercial Midlanders, a race obstinate and staunch of backbone, utilitarian in outlook, yet not without imagination and romance streaking its hard vulgarity. That this old chapel-going, money-worshipping race should, amid the mud and soot and steam and flame of the Potteries, bring itself up to date with big villas and costly motor-cars and Continental travel, is typical of modern manufacturing England, but that it should grow critical of itself and produce Mr. Bennett, who in "The Old Wives' Tale" unrolls before us in epic breadth the changing fortunes of the Bursley shopkeepers, is really a rare stroke of fortune. The novel will repay the attention of the social historian; in it lives again not merely a generation of tradesfolk that is now dead or done for, but the undying soul of provincialism.

The opening, as the closing, scene of the epic is laid in St. Luke's Square, round which the shopkeeping aristocracy of Bursley in the sixties is ranged. Mr. Baines' draper's shop is the business establishment most respected by the burgesses of Bursley, and Mr. Baines, a bedridden paralytic for twelve years, is still "our honored fellow-townsman" in his neighbors' phrase, and in Mr. Critchlow's, his old crony, the chemist. Mr. Critchlow, a tall, thin figure, of rasping common sense and pharmaceutical dignity, is admirably indicated; so is Mr. Povey, the inconspicuous, ambitious, efficient shop assistant, Mrs. Baines' right-hand; and so is Mrs. Baines herself, the comely, stout, and commanding matron, who watches her customers, her servants, and her daughters, Constance and Sophia, with calm brows and all-seeing eyes. Where Mr. Bennett shows himself the artistic master of his burgesses' atmosphere, which he must surely have absorbed in early youth, even as Dickens before him, is in the relation which he draws of the family life upstairs to the shop life below and the town life outside. The old-fashioned shopkeeper was a substantial person, narrow in outlook, but an inheritor of honorable traditions, and in his way a pillar of the State no less than his near relative, the yeoman farmer. Mrs. Baines, née Syme, from the moorland parish of Axe, and her majestic and awe-inspiring sister, Aunt Harriet, are persons typical of the wholesome history of generations of farming housewives.

The formidable wordly shrewdness, innate Philistinism, and commercial aptitude of the British middle-class is built on such social foundations as the Baines, the Symes, the Maddocks, the Bolderos, the Birkenshaws, and the Scales (all families in the drama) embody, and could

JUSTIN McCARTHY'S GREAT WORK.

Mr. Justin McCarthy, in his "History of Our Own Times," has chronicled, in an absolutely impartial, and in an absorbingly interesting manner, that immediate past which has just "gone into History," and which is confessedly the most difficult for the historian to deal with, because his task is more or less a stirring up of storms that have scarcely subsided, and a record of controversies from which time has not yet obliterated the bitterness.

This work is a chronicle of the religious, literary, artistic, scientific, philanthropical, and sociological developments of the time between the accession of Queen Victoria and that of our present King, and a record of the men and women who were connected with these varied activities.

A Unique Addition.

There will be no better news for book-lovers than that there is now issued a complete and in many respects a unique edition of this work in seven volumes. It is embellished with plates collected from various sources, the illustrations being such as have never before been brought together. They include a representative series of portraits and reproductions of pictures of historical events and of rare prints illustrative of the life of the period. These plates are historically illuminative, and will add greatly to the enjoyment of the narrative, as does also the bold readable type.

The Student of Politics and economics will find this work indispensable to his library, because it is the only complete and all-round record of this particular period ever attempted. Perhaps the two most marked features of the work are the sound judgment that underlies every page, and the accuracy of detail, date, and description which gives the book a value apart from the mere question of its being of absorbing interest. It is issued on such terms as bring it well within the reach of the slenderest income.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor, M.P.—

"The temper of the book, with its admirable serenity and boundless tolerance, is a part of its charm. I know of no better guide in the art of writing, of clear and calm thinking, and of a sound, broad, and humane outlook on man and life."

A REMARKABLE BOOK ON NATURE STUDY.

The primary object of the publication of "The Book of Nature Study" has been to assist those who wish to grasp the methods by which a study of Nature—that wide field of knowledge the educative value of which is now fully recognised—may best be carried on. We all want our children to know the wonderful facts of Animal and Plant Life, and to understand and love the ever-varying expression of inanimate Nature, but we do not know how this knowledge may best be presented to the youthful mind.

The Book of Nature Study is edited by Professor Bretland Farmer, assisted by a staff of men and women contributors who, as well as being professors of the Natural Sciences they deal with, are also trained teachers, experienced in assorting and imparting information on subjects that are confessedly difficult to teach. The Book of Nature Study is accurate and scientific, without being dull. It has hundreds of text illustrations, beautiful coloured plates, and an admirable series of folding models showing the internal parts of flowers, birds, &c., which form an invaluable aid to all who give lessons in physiology. The masterly simplicity with which each department of Nature knowledge is elucidated would alone be sufficient to place this great work high above all other books on Nature.

we trace back their social origins we should recognise that a larger national drama lies behind, in the transformation of the yeoman and small farmer into the tradesman and the modern commercial Briton. Here is the significance of this social epic: none of the characters, in mental refinement or manners, show any inheritance of gentle breeding. It is a stratum of Midland trading progress and prosperity, the inner humanity of these Pottery folk, homely and harsh as their own Staffordshire clay, that confines the author's horizon. The two heroines, Sophia and Constance Baines, whose life stories our author traces from their impulsive girlhood till their death as elderly women finally laid on the shelf, are presented with the good-humored familiarity of their nurse who sees through them, or of an aunt who will "stand no nonsense." We assist at the notable death-bed scene of the paralytic Mr. Baines, when the beautiful Miss Sophia, who should be watching in the sick-room, is flirting with the gallant young Mr. Scales, the commercial traveller of the great Birkenshaws, and horribly well done is this death-bed in its actuality and hard vulgarity. Vulgarity—we use the word advisedly, for even the masterly scenes are painted with a harsh complacency of tone, and a brutal stress laid on obstrusive material facts that are both a criticism and a reflection of the shopkeeping soul. The courtship of Sophia by the commercial Don Juan, Mr. Scales, his plotted seduction of her in a London hotel, the shrewdness of her resistance, his sulky acquiescence in their marriage and their honeymoon in Paris, all this is photographic in its detail, and, no doubt, fairly true to the manners of Bursley.

Similarly we do not criticise, but follow with the tribute of our absorption the narrative of how the placid Constance is wooed and won by the mild but energetic assistant, Mr. Povey, of how Mrs. Baines, in defeat, fades off the drapery horizon, of how Cyril, the son and heir, is born, of his unpleasantly spoiled youth, and the paternal struggles to instil into him decency. Let us confide to the author that his epic here grows tedious, as elsewhere where we suspect him of obvious reminiscences. But the whole narrative holds us; it is life, life petty, commonplace, mysterious, beneath its daily mediocrity and apparent inconsequence, and we are suddenly arrested by the cynical and shattering domestic tragedy of a Bursley burgess, our highly-esteemed fellow-citizen, Mr. Daniel Povey. Mrs. Daniel Povey is an irreclaimable drunkard, and in a fit of ungovernable rage her respectable husband, the confectioner, murders her. His arrest, trial, execution, and the fruitless petition and public protest of the Bursley townsmen, all this is recorded and analysed with a force and sincerity that command our applause. Mr. Bennett shows that he has studied in a good school, and the best French realists would shake him by the hand. Mr. Povey, the draper, who has thrown himself body and soul into the defence of his cousin, the confectioner, catches pneumonia, dies of his exertions, and with Constance a widow, we turn to follow, again at epic length, the fortunes of her sister, the indomitable Sophia.

In Book III. our author sketches with undeniable cleverness Sophia's life in Paris with her wastrel of a husband, and the rapid decline of the couple's fortunes. Effective though the picture is, we perceive that the vulgarity of the mental atmosphere is not that of the late sixties, but of forty years later. It is the Paris of yesterday seen through the uncompromising stare of a modern Bursleyite that is presented to us, though we are frankly entertained by the account of the siege, of Sophia's relations with the aged cocotte, Madame Foucault, and of the rise and glory of the Pension Frensham in the Rue Lord Byron. Mr. Bennett always interests us by his keen absorption in the hard vulgarities of the commercial atmosphere, English or French, but he is not quite himself till he brings Sophia, now a woman of sixty, back to Bursley with a fortune of many thousand pounds. From this point the narrative is masterly. The description of the aged Constance's obsession by the cares of her incubus of a house in St. Luke's Square, of her useless worries, of her sciatica, of her devotion to her hard and ungrateful son Cyril, of the two old ladies' sojourn in the Rutland Hotel, Buxton, and of Sophia's defeat, and their return to the grimy embraces of their birthplace—all this is handled with the skill of an old Dutch master. Then the wretched Gerald Scales reappears suddenly out of the void which has hidden him for thirty-six years, and dies at Mr. Boldero's, the Manchester jeweler. The death-bed scene, Sophia's dulled reflections on the waste of her life, her return to Bursley, and her own sudden death by a stroke, all this again is seen and shown us with a horrible prosaic remorselessness that could not be bettered. The closing chapter, entitled "The End of Constance," the irrevocable end of all these human plans and projects, these matings and meetings, these journeyings, these ambitions, and this petty wearing away of youth, health, and strength till our dim eyes glaze and fix in the fading light, these chapters bring to a close what is, in its scheme and performance, a really remarkable work. We cannot but congratulate Mr. Bennett on his return to the field of provincial life that is by rights his own. He knows the provincials through and through.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

Most Londoners know Kew Gardens as a pleasure resort, and are aware of the existence within its gates of a large horticultural and botanical institution, and of an observatory where watches are sent to be tested as to their time-keeping properties. They know it also as a place where one may walk at will across acres of grassy turf, undeterred by the warning notice-board; and this is no slight privilege for a pavement-ridden populace. But how few have studied its history, or understand its significance as the nursery garden of the British Empire, if not of the world! That the array of elaborate houses, the trees, flowers, lakes, and so forth, must be controlled by a carefully organised staff of workmen is, of course, obvious; but how carefully organised those workmen are, and how far their work extends beyond the making of the Gardens attractive, has only been dimly suspected hitherto. Kew, indeed, has not guarded its secrets with any jealousy; the reason for the general ignorance of its inner meaning is, in the main, the general familiarity with its outward features As an institution it has been long enough in existence to be taken for granted, and in these days being taken for granted comes perilously near being neglected. Now the story of "The Royal Botanic Gardens, Kew" (Cassell & Co., 20s. net), as told by Mr. W. J. Bean and illustrated by the color drawings of Mr. H. A. Olivier and the photographs of Mr. E. J. Wallis, is one of world-wide interest and imperial importance. This fine volume is divided into five parts, and every part is worth study both for itself and in its relation to the whole. The origin and development of the Botanic Gardens would alone have made a substantial volume; but here we have many other topics treated, including the work that the institution has done, and is doing, and the present collection of specimens within the grounds. In regard to the latter, Mr. Bean is assistant-Curator, and no one is more familiar than he with the details of his charge; a more authoritative description of the plants could not have been written. Historically, the importance of Kew looms large on account of its connection with the Royal Family during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Queen Caroline devoted a great part of her life and means to what she considered the beautification of the grounds by the erection of pseudo-classic buildings, most of which have disappeared. In those days, Richmond Lodge, demolished in 1772, and Kew House, which survived another thirty years, divided the honors as Royal residences; the two demesnes represented by these were not then amalgamated. The beginnings of Kew as an institution of botanical science are difficult to date. The middle of the eighteenth century, however, was the first period of great botanical activity—a period when the Princess Dowager of Wales gave her patronage to the efforts of Lord Bute, Aiton, Sir William Chambers—one is reminded that the architect of Somerset House was responsible for the Pagoda—and others. Bute, by the way, appears to have been better as a botanist than as a statesman. Between 1818 and 1841 Kew suffered a spell of decadence, from which it was aroused by the "Lindley Report" of the latter year, and by its transference to the control of the Woods and Forests Department. Sir William Hooker became its director, and from that time onwards its progress has never faltered. To-day the total area of the grounds is 250 acres instead of the original 15. The Herbarium building contains 2,000,000 specimens, and the Library 23,000 volumes. It is engaged on a Botanical Survey of the British Empire, which has already reached nearly forty volumes. THE TRAGEDY OF . . RICHARD THE THIRD

Edited by HORACE HOWARD FURNESS, Jr.

Being the Sixteenth Volume of the

NEW VARIORUM EDITION of the Works of

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE.

Those interested in the study of Shakespeare's plays will recall that a few years ago Horace Howard Furness, Jr., prepared a revision of his father's Variorum Edition of Macbeth, which was most favourably received by Shakespearean critics. It manifests ability and scholarship, and demonstrates the wisdom of Dr. Furness in associating his son with this invaluable work.

In the present volume the editor has used as a basis the text of the first folio edition of 1623, incorporating the additions of the quartos, and recording omissions and transpositions in the texual notes, together with a commentary containing criticisms from the days of Pope to the present day.

The Appendix contains the Stage History of the play; discusses the Text, the Date of Composition, and the Source of Plot; with criticism by English and German authors too voluminous to be included in the Commentary.

no department of plant life that it does not cover. Since Hooker's day it has been enriched by the Jodrell Laboratory for the study of plant physiology, and by the late Miss North's picture gallery, while its Vistas, its Palm House and other glass-roofed palaces, and its wealth of trees and flowers, raised in the face of difficulties such as dry, sandy soil, climatic vagaries, and a landscape flatness that hampers picturesque arrangement, are among the wonders of the world. In this book's revelation of these wonders the illustrations play no mean part. The late Director, Sir W. Thiselton-Dyer, who contributes the Introduction, tells us that Mr. Olivier's drawings inspired the text; they are, at any rate, worthy of it, in so far that in their large treatment of color masses they express more completely the spirit of the Kew landscape than any amount of pricked-out detail could hope to convey. Both these and Mr. Wallis's well-composed photographs deserve the highest praise.

We are glad to see that Professor L. T. Hobhouse's "Morals in Evolution: A Study in Comparative Ethics" (Chapman & Hall, 2 vols., 21s. net) has reached a second edition. The author tells us that "apart from emendations on a few points of detail" the book is substantially unaltered. It is, perhaps, the most authoritative contribution to comparative ethics in English, and, while indispensable to students, it contains a great deal likely to interest the general reader as well. Professor Hobhouse's chapters on "Marriage and the Position of Women" and "Women in the Civilised World" deal with a problem now very much discussed, and give in brief compass the materials which are necessary to an understanding of the real basis of feminism. But the whole book is suggestive. It would be hard to find a treatise of the sort which is at once so thoroughly popular in the best sense of the term, and, at the same time, so trustworthy.

Mr. Reginald Rankin, who acted as war correspondent for the "Times" in Morocco has published an account of the campaign in a volume called "In Morocco with General D'Amade" (Longmans, 9s. net). We fear that the average reader's interest in Morocco has been swallowed up by the far more stirring events now happening in the Near East. But those who want a clear account of the Moroccan campaign and of the events that led up to it cannot do better than consult Mr. Rankin's pages. For the military student the book is of great value. Mr. Rankin was in General D'Amade's confidence throughout the campaign in Chaóuiya, he has an expert knowledge of tactics, and the fighting and manœuvres are described in full detail. In a concluding chapter on "The Future of Morocco," Mr. Rankin looks to France to settle the country and avert European complications. The withdrawal of France would, he thinks, so far from promoting peace, rather tend the other way. At any moment a massacre of Europeans might take place, and Germany would hardly fail to make political capital out of any such event. On the other hand, if France consents to grant an open door to European trade in Morocco, Mr. Rankin is convinced that she can occupy the country with the cordial assent of every Power except Germany. The discussion of the question is full of interest, and as it may become acute at any time, Mr. Rankin is to be congratulated on this authoritative account of Morocco and Moroccan problems.

"The Justice of the Mexican War" (Putnam, 5s. net) —of 1846—is a patriotic attempt on the part of its author, Mr. Charles H. Owen, to whitewash the American Government in respect of an act of aggression condemned by many historians since that time. The subject may not be of immediate importance and interest to the average British reader, but the book becomes quite readable after one has waded through the introductory chapters. These consist of a rather pompous discussion of the ethics of history-writing and an autobiographical sketch of Mr. Owen's own career, and might well have been curtailed. His arguments are not entirely convincing. It seems, for instance, a little specious to infer that, because there was plainly more justification for the Mexican affair than for the recent quarrel with Spain over Cuba and certain other American imbroglios, the first-named was, therefore, justifiable. Neither does his belief that the annexation of Texas and the resulting war were in enforcement of the Monroe Doctrine help his case very much. He produces some evidence to show that Great Britain and other European Powers were casting longing eyes on California at that time; but such evidence, even granting its reliability, is far less justification for the appropriation of Texas than was the obvious failure of the Mexican Government to control that portion of its territory. It is clear, however, that the States showed exemplary patience in dealing with their weaker neighbour, and—with a late "justifiable war" of our own still fresh in the memory—it is hardly for the Britisher to cast stones; even though it was a pro-slavery party that dominated American policy, and that policy was far from justified by its results.

In the opening chapter of "Two Dianas in Alaska," by Agnes Herbert and a Shikári (Lane, 12s. 6d. net), Miss Herbert tells us that a lady to whom she gave a copy of her last book returned it with the remark that she "didn't like so much killing." Miss Herbert retorts by saying, "Are we not all killing creatures every day?" and apparently believes that if we are unable to deny the charge we have no right to blame her for shooting scores of caribou, bears, walrus, moose, wolves, foxes, and other animals who chanced to come within range of her rifle. The problem is not quite so simple as this, and we sympathise with Miss Herbert's friend, though at the same time we must admit that this record of the experiences of the two Dianas is such good reading that we are almost moved to condone the slaughter. From the moment of their arrival on Kodiak Island, the two ladies seem to have enjoyed themselves with zest, despite the many inconveniences of their trip. They both possess the sportsman's qualities as well as his defects, and their descriptions of the wild animals they killed or failed to kill are clever to brilliancy. The marriage of one of the party and the hint that that of the other will not be long delayed bring the volume to a fitting conclusion. The photographs are excellent.

Lady Priestley's "The Story of a Lifetime" (Kegan Paul, 12s. 6d. net) was first written and issued for private circulation five years ago, at the request of the author's children. It is now published in the ordinary way in answer to numerous requests. Lady Priestley is the daughter of Dr. Robert Chambers, the famous Edinburgh publisher, and author of "Vestiges of Creation," a book that made a great stir in its day. His daughter tells us that Dr. Chambers never owned to any of his family that he wrote the book, which appeared anonymously in 1844. William Howitt had, however, seen a copy of the work in Dr. Chambers's house, marked with numerous corrections in his handwriting, and the matter was put beyond doubt by the late Mr. Alexander Ireland, who, in 1883, admitted that he was the one man to whom Chambers had confided the secret of the authorship. Chambers was acquainted with a crowd of interesting people, including De Quincey, Thackeray, Dickens, Bulwer Lytton, Wilkie Collins, George Henry Lewes, and Sir Noel Paton, and we get some interesting glimpses of all these in Lady Priestley's pages. When, in 1856, the author married Dr. Overend Priestley, who was subsequently knighted for his services to surgery, and who represented the Universities of Edinburgh and St. Andrew's in Parliament, she came into contact with a more scientific set. She has anecdotes of Pasteur, Huxley, Herbert Spencer, Lister, Paget, and others famous in the scientific world of the latter half of the nineteenth century. The book cannot be said to contain anything of first-rate importance, but, as a collection of entertaining and vivacious gossip, it may be heartily recommended.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information, and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."
—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."

THE feature of this week in the City has been the cordial welcome extended to several new issues. Natal offered half a million pounds 3½ per cent. Consolidated stock at 95½. The Industrial Bank of Japan made an issue of two million pounds 5 per cent. Sterling bonds, half of it in London and the other moiety in Paris, at 97, both principal and interest being unconditionally guaranteed by the Imperial Japanese Government. Natal and Japan scored instant successes, the subscription lists being closed considerably before the advertised time. The inference that there is still plenty of money available for investment is difficult to resist, yet high-class securities are not, on the whole, in favor, and the Funds show a slight decline on the week. The Home Railway market tends to slip back into sluggishness, the public declining to buy. Foreign Government bonds retain a moderate show of firmness, the strength of Russians and the weakness of Peruvian Corporation issues being two distinctive marks. American Railroad shares rushed headlong up, only to receive a check on Thursday. Mining markets have been occupied but poorly during the week. Rio Tinto shares provided the only really notable excitement.

CONSOLS' COMPETITORS.

Once within the last few days did Consols revive, and that was when the German Emperor made his already historic announcement. The Stock Exchange declared colloquially that the Kaiser had "caved in," whereupon up went prices all round, because once more the political tension was relieved. A rise reared upon so sentimental a foundation cannot be expected to last, unless generous public buying comes to aid the market in upholding values. Such did not appear, so the price of Consols dropped quietly to the lower level, which it had taken up in consequence of rumors that a large new Indian Government Loan would shortly be out. Last week it was the prospect of a Navy Loan which frightened the market; this week it is an India issue, while on Monday next, November 23, comes the Government statement respecting the Irish Land arrangements, which the Stock Exchange expects will involve an early appeal for further funds from the public. Whether or not the India Council will make another issue before long, the rumor adds one more to the clouds which overhang Consols. All these gilt-edged stocks come into direct competition with the Funds. Each, to win success, must be offered at a price that will compare not only favorably, but attractively, with the quotation for Consols. Present proprietors of the stock are continually having spread before them some new temptation to exchange their old lamps for new. Meanwhile, the investor who might put money into the Funds has a field of choice open to him in which every security offers a more remunerative yield at a risk but slightly greater than that attaching even to the premier security itself. Dealers in the market say that the steady stream of buying orders for Consols grows less every year, instead of broadening out, as it might have been expected to do with the gradual accumulation of savings. Consols are suffering from competition just as keenly as any industry in the country, and the cry gathers in volume which deprecates, now, the reduction of the interest from the "sweet simplicity of the Three per cents" to the more modest 2½ per cent. which obtains at the present day.

GOLD MINING IN THE TRANSVAAL.

That the supporters of Chinese labor in the mines of the Rand should be slow to admit the growing prosperity of the industry under present conditions is natural enough. There are, of course, Chinese coolies still left in South Africa, whose replacement by native labor is merely a matter of time. The interesting point is that gold mining on the Rand is at the present time more successful than it has ever been in its comparatively brief history. Prophets who poured their vials of woe, lamentation, and despair upon the idea of the gold mines being worked on a commercial basis without the aid of the beloved vagabond coolie from China, are hiding their diminished heads, as nearly every monthly return, both as regards output of gold and the number of workers, tells of steady increase. The people most ultimately connected with the industry, recognising that there really was no hope of retaining the Oriental, have most sensibly bent their energies to the prosecution of scientific mining with a success which fairly deserves to be called remarkable. Improved methods of working have resulted in a reduction of costs in a manner which would have been scouted as absurd not many years ago. Lord Harris, at the meeting of the Consolidated Goldfields of South Africa, held the other day, permitted himself to speak in a vein of optimism which was all the more valuable in that it came from one who of recent years has declined to color the outlook in the Transvaal with a cheerful brush. Chairmen of public companies, and especially of concerns engaged in mining, not often err on the side of caution in their utterances; but Lord Harris has refused to run when he did not see clearly how to walk, and, therefore, his evidence of a widening prosperity for South Africa, including Rhodesia, is all the more weighty now. For gambling purposes, these scientific mining methods are worse than useless. They ruthlessly narrow that bright horizon of unknown possibilities which allure the speculator, whose experience of mirage following mirage never seems to dim his eager ardor for fresh excursions into the land where performance too rarely proves the handmaid of promise. But the speculative investor, willing to take certain measures of risk for the sake of getting 10 per cent. upon his money, is being gradually reattracted to South African dividend-paying mining shares. It is a speculation—all mining has that flavor, and no sane person expects to get 10 per cent. without it—but with the strides being made in mining science, and with the knowledge that properties can be valued to some extent upon an intrinsic standard, he is prepared to look with a kindlier eye than heretofore upon the shares. This kind of demand is, again, of small use to a market pining for "revival"—swift rises in quotations, unexpected discoveries, and so on, which produce a fever to buy, not a comparatively few shares to pay for, but substantial lots as a simple gamble. Nevertheless, the true interest of every department in the Stock Exchange is to get the suffrage of the actual payer for shares, and such support is being accorded with increasing steadiness to the good speculative investments of the South African market.

Messrs. CHATTO & WINDUS'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

In 1890 William Morris's new KELMSCOTT PRESS reminded English Printers that Typography was an ART before it became a trade. But "noble printing," thus returned to the markets of to-day, came only as a new luxury for the few. The aim of is, however, to publish "nobly printed" books at a commercial price within the reach of all. The Florence type is designed by Mr. H. P. Horne.

THE ROMAUNT OF THE ROSE

of Geoffrey Chaucer, now ready, is the first of the Florence Press Books. The Price of the volume is high, but nevertheless, it is the cheapest and most beautiful book issued in England during the last twenty years. The Florence Press trusts that the public appreciation of its first issue will, hereafter, enable it to issue its books in larger editions, and consequently at a lower price. All interested in the revival of English Printing, and the bringing of "noble books" within reach of all are invited to write for the prospectuses of the Florence Press and of its first publication :—

THE ROMAUNT OF THE ROSE

of Geoffrey Chaucer, Illustrated after the Water Colour Paintings by Keith Henderson and Norman Wilkinson of Four Oaks.

The illustrations are the first book illustrations reproduced by the new MEDICI PROCESS. The book measures 10 by 7½ ins. The special copies printed upon vellum are all subscribed. Of the 500 numbered copies printed upon hand-made Aldwych paper, 475 are for sale.

THE WEEK IN THE CITY	356

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

On Tuesday, the House of Lords, meeting, not indeed, in their Chamber, but in "a famous house in a famous square," carried, by an overwhelming majority, an amendment to the second reading of the Licensing Bill, imperiously impressed upon them by Lord Lansdowne, pledging the House to reject the measure as causing "grave inconvenience," and violating equity in its dealing with the classes it affects. On the following day the Peers adjourned from Lord Lansdowne's house to their more usual meeting place, and the same resolution was proposed, in a rather shame-faced and feebly-argued speech, by the gentleman who had already secured its adoption. At the Lansdowne House meeting the Opposition peers were not, however, quite unanimous. Lord Lytton, whom we hope one day to see in a Liberal Cabinet, was strongly favorable, and Lord St. Aldwyn made his usual balanced speech in the same direction. Lord Milner thought the Bill capable of improvement. On the floor of the House, the Bishop of London insisted that the decision to reject the principle of the Bill practically meant the creation of a freehold in licences, and a trade impregnable to assault for years. Lord Lansdowne hinted that his motive for taking this course was the fear that the Government would treat the Lords' amendments as they have treated important amendments to the Pensions Bill. Lord St. Aldwyn declared, with some warmth for so cold a politician, for the whole machinery of the Bill, criticising only the scale of compensation, the length of the time limit, and the introduction of local option. On all these points, of course, a compromise might have been arrived at. He also suggested that the Lords might yet pass the second reading if the Government would assure them that the repressive parts of the Bill were open to amendment.

The second day's debate on the Licensing Bill brought into line two powerful forces of protest against the scandalous compact of the aristocracy and the brewing trade. The first was represented by the Primate, who took a higher line of moral rebuke than he has ever yet adopted—a line such as the Episcopal Bench has not, we think, taken before in its history. His point was to contrast the force and significance of the supporters of the Bill—excluding the temperance societies, but including practically all the religious, reforming, ethical, and ameliorative agencies in the kingdom—and the materialist and exclusive character of the opposition. The speech has made the "Times," hitherto a fanatical opponent, hint at compromise, and it will be interesting to see whether the Primate contemplates further action with a view to separating the Church on this issue from the false step taken by the aristocracy. Lord Rosebery powerfully supported the Archbishop. He, like others, thought some of the financial provisions oppressive, but he strongly defended the central principle of the measure, the recovery of State control of licences. He insisted that, as a matter of national shame and compunction, the historic parties must come to an agreement, so that, to parody Archbishop Magee's epigram, England may not only be free but sober. It seems to us that the Government is now helpless; but why should not the Primate and Lord Rosebery act?

The friends and enemies of the Educational compromise are being rapidly regimented. On the face of it, the opposition seems formidable. The Dean of Canterbury, nicely poised between Lord Hugh Cecil and Lord Halifax, has obtained 114,000 signatures, including those of over 2,000 vicars, for the movement of revolt against the Primate. Both the National Society and the National Union of Teachers are hostile, and there is a special centre of resistance in Lancashire organised by the Bishop of Manchester. Furthermore, the Roman Catholics have not accepted the very handsome scale of grants, with permission to pool their amounts, which Mr. Runciman has offered them. Nonconformist opposition appears to centre largely in the West Riding, but not to be unanimous there. On the other hand, the Settlement Committee, whose appeal we print elsewhere, includes five Bishops, six Deans, the masters of many University Colleges and Public Schools, and a body of opinion conspicuous for its intellectual weight and eminence in the worlds of religion, science, education, letters, and affairs. The main difficulties would seem to be the irreconcilable character of the English Catholics, who will not follow the usually moderate lead of Archbishop Bourne, the wrecking tactics of the extreme High Churchmen who, like Lord Hugh Cecil, treat Cowper-Templeism as "poison," and the danger of the Bishop of London alienating the Nonconformists by excessive demands.

In an excellent opening speech on the second reading of the new Bill, Mr. Runciman represented himself partly as an arbitrator, partly as an "honest broker" dealing with three parties, the Anglican Church, the Catholics, and the Nonconformists, and bent on securing what he happily called "soopleness i' things immaterial." He claimed that the three material pledges of the Liberal Party, public control for rate-aided schools, no rate payment for denominational teaching, and no tests for teachers were fulfilled, and the national system, with, he hoped, small exceptions, was also secure. Mr. Runciman might have added that he had also obtained the practical establishment of Cowper-Templeism as the "norm" of religious teaching. On the other hand, the Church had made substantial gains in securing the right of entry. The settlement was an agreement, not a victory for any party, a balanced settlement, made necessary by the fact that half the time of the best officials in his department was given up to the religious controversy.

Mr. Hutton, for the Left Wing Nonconformists, made a brilliant speech, declaring that the leaning to peace meant "weakness of flesh" rather than a "sudden access of Christian charity." For the first time, a Liberal Government had established denominationalism, and the Church had made a great gain by letting the State take over 450,000 children in her own schools, while obtaining a right of entry over the three million children in the public schools. Mr. T. P. O'Connor, speaking for the Catholics, treated the Bill as a retrogression from the Act of 1902, and as involving a loss to Catholic schools of £130,000 a year. The Tory opposition was divided. Sir William Anson spoke not unfavorably, but Mr. Joynson Hicks, as the voice of the Bishop of Manchester, was unfriendly. The friendship of Sir George White, Mr. Massie, and Mr. Helm, was distinctly expressed, but Lord Edmund Talbot repudiated the Bill for the English Catholics, Mr. Yoxall for the teachers, Lord Robert Cecil for the High Churchmen, and Mr. Ramsay Macdonald for a section of the Labor Party.

The second day's debate was heavily scored with an ominous speech from Mr. Balfour, who was not consulted on the negotiations, an omission for which he apparently means to make the Government pay dear. Mr. Balfour's line was to express an abstract desire for a settlement, but to declare that the Bill was merely a compromise which (a) satisfied no party with keen views—neither the Church party, nor the Nonconformists, nor the Irish and English Catholics, nor the Labor Party; and (b) did not bind the Bishops, who were nominally contracting parties, not to accept better terms later on. He thought the transfer of the Anglican schools, for which a million was subscribed, would cause "intense bitterness," which, added to the general atmosphere of coldness and suspicion, implied that the way of peace had not been found. As we suspected he would, Mr. Balfour is playing the part of champion of the National Society and the less liberal-minded of the clergy.

Mr. Asquith, challenged on the point of what was the precise bargain which lay behind the Bill, answered that the parties had got so near together that the Government had taken the responsibility of framing the eventual lines of agreement. He properly repudiated the exacting language of some of the Catholics, who were not satisfied with an addition of about 10s. a child to the grant with which they are content in Scotland. Mr. Lough, the ex-Parliamentary Secretary of the Board of Education, was very critical, but the balance of the debate inclined strongly to the Government. The division, however, was rather disappointing, 157 Radicals, High Church Tories, Labor men, and Irish and English Catholics, voting against the second reading. The majority was substantial—323. But it is clear that the Bill will not stand amendment, for which we see that the Bishop of London is already pressing.

Lord Roberts, whose military reputation is not broad enough to cover his complete want of political knowledge and responsibility, made a mischievous advance in the House of Lords on Monday, on his policy of conscription, with a special application to Germany. His action took the form of a resolution calling on the Government to provide, in addition to a great Navy, an Army strong enough to stop the most formidable invading Power, and also asking for a Ministerial statement on defence, in view of the new Anglo-German situation. Lord Lansdowne induced Lord Roberts to withdraw the last part of his resolution, and supported the first, which was carried against Lord Crewe's protest. Lord Roberts's speech took the monstrous form of working out in detail a scheme of invasion by a force of 150,000 German soldiers, as to which he assumed that they could be carried by 200,000 tons of shipping, and could easily be accumulated and concentrated without attracting our notice, and suddenly flung on these shores. Lord Roberts suggested that this force would be helped by the 80,000 German waiters, porters, and barbers now in this country. Having assumed his proposition, Lord Roberts demanded a force of a million British conscripts to deal with it. The German Conservative Press is naturally indignant, and assumes that Lord Roberts's speech really covers a British policy for the military invasion of Germany.

The Turkish elections have gone so far that it is possible already to take stock of some of the results. The Committee of Union and Progress has swept European Turkey where it is dominant, and elected many of its nominees in Asiatic Turkey where its organisation is feeble. The Committee has been prudent enough to put up not only Moslems, and among the members already elected are some Armenians who were prominent revolutionaries, one or two Jews, a few Serbs, and a Roumanian, as well as Greeks and Bulgars. The Bulgars have done badly, one of the consequences of the declaration of independence. The Greeks have been far more successful, because they are more numerous, and better organised, but they have repeatedly quarrelled with the Committee, which they charge with illegality in the conduct of the elections. In Constantinople they refused for a time to vote, with the result that the Armenians and Jews are voting solidly with the Moslems against them. It is hoped to convene the Parliament by about the 10th of next month, and no doubt the Parliament will deal with knotty questions of electoral irregularities which have arisen owing to the inexperience of the people.

The Bill establishing perpetual imprisonment for offences already punished by the law, and depriving certain classes of its protection, was brought up for report on Tuesday night, and we rejoice to know that the Government dared not risk a division on it. Every speech in the debate, save that of Mr. Gladstone himself, was hostile to this proposal, the three Liberals who joined in it being in strong opposition, and Sir William Collins delivering a weighty argument against it. A fourth, Mr. Dillon, who was a member of the Gladstone Committee on the prison system, rightly described the idea as "retrograde, cruel, and scandalous." Argument and appeals to remove a bad blot on a good Bill have alike been lost on the Home Secretary, and it only remains for the House to save him and the Government from an error of great magnitude, and to reject this part of the Prevention of Crime Bill. We hope that Liberal, Labor, and Nationalist members will vote against it, and we know that more than one Conservative lawyer will support them. We believe the feeling in the country on the subject is thoroughly hostile, and is much more keenly aroused than Mr. Gladstone imagines.

On Friday of last week the New York "American" published what purported to be the substance of the suppressed interview with the Kaiser by Dr. Hale, and the next day the "World" gave a version not materially different. In both accounts the Kaiser was credited with having laid stress upon the Yellow Peril, and denounced England's alliance with Japan as a betrayal of the white man's cause deeply resented in the Colonies. Dr. Hale and the German Government have repudiated both versions as baseless fiction, although, curiously enough, the "World" has printed in its own defence a proof-sheet of the interview annotated by Dr. Hale. There appear to have been two versions of the interview —one written for the New York "Times," which has never been published though advance proofs of it were pretty widely circulated, and a second rigidly censored by the German Embassy and intended for the "Century" magazine, but withdrawn after the "Telegraph" interview. It is probable that the "Times" version reflected more or less accurately the unrestrained vigorous and wholly unofficial expression of a vehement temperament, and was never intended for other than a private ear; and it is possible that the "World" and "American" accounts have been drawn from this version, with the i's dotted and the t's crossed. That would perhaps explain their emphatic repudiation, while leaving the American papers guilty rather of an offence akin to publishing private letters than of actual fabrication.

On Monday Mr. Birrell introduced his Irish Land Bill for amending the Purchase Act of 1903. Mr. Birrell made a serious correction in Mr. Wyndham's estimate of the cost of buying out the landlords. Instead of 100 millions, the price would be nearer 180 millions. Thirty millions had been allotted, and there were pending agreements amounting to 52 millions, so that about 100 millions more would be required. On this the net annual loss must at present prices be over £600,000 a year. Irish rates could not fairly bear this burden, so the English Exchequer would come to the rescue, and would cover a deficiency of £20,000 a year on an annual issue of five millions. The landlord's bonuses were to be cut down and graduated in proportion to the number of years' purchase of estates. The second part of the Bill involves a great attempt to relieve the congestion in the West by substituting culture for cattle grazing. The Congested Districts Board is to have more power and a quarter of a million of income, and a larger area to work on. They must decide between the cattle and the people. Mr. Redmond and Mr. Dillon were very favorable, and Mr. William O'Brien more balanced. But the note of Tory opposition was somewhat pronounced, even Mr. Wyndham joining in it, and Mr. Long denounced the linking of land purchase with a drastic measure of land migration.

The Reichstag is in the midst of a first reading of the new financial proposal which will last ten days. Prince Bülow opened the debate and explained how the building of the fleet in a hurry led to indifference to sound finance. He contended that, while Germany's credit made such a bad show compared with that of England or France, the Empire, with a fortune accumulating at the rate of £200,000,000 a year, and with a low tax system, was well able to bear additional burdens. There does not, however, seem much likelihood of Herr Sydow's ambition to relinquish loans, equate receipts and expenditure, and put the finance on a permanently secure basis being realised. Several groups of the Reichstag think the demand for £25,000,000 a year altogether excessive, but these same groups do not press for economy and a reduction in the expenditure on armaments, though this year the Navy estimates are up several millions. But the individual taxes have met with the severest criticism. Most of the groups think the new death duties a mistake, the spirit monopoly awakes the indignation of the Agrarians, the Radicals and Liberals find the taxes generally constructed with a view to the yield and not their equity, and the duty on electricity and gas finds hardly a friend. There can be no doubt that the Government's proposals will be very severely handled in Committee.

Even the Republicans during the Presidential election had to promise tariff reform, and a committee of the House is now sitting on the tariff. A good deal of very familiar evidence is being accumulated to show that the tariff is an excellent device for plundering the mass of the nation for the benefit of a few, but the most sensational contribution to the inquiry has been made by Mr. Carnegie, in an article in the "Century Magazine." Mr. Carnegie says that steel no longer needs protection. So far from its being an infant industry in the United States, America has now a steel output of 23,000,000 tons, or more than that of Germany, Britain, France and Belgium combined, and produced at a lower price than in any other country. American industry generally, he thinks, no longer needs protection, and the true policy is a tariff for revenue. Mr. Carnegie's views do not seem to have found much sympathy among the steel magnates, and the "stand-patters" are rather aghast at these wounds from a friend's hands, though the Democrats think extracts from the article would make a nice campaign document. Some observers profess to expect a genuine tariff revision on this occasion, because it is obviously wise, and Mr. Taft would like it. But such optimism is misplaced. The Republican party is the handmaid of the Trusts and the protected interests, and it has neither the power nor the will to rebel against them.

The next issue of The Nation will have a special literary supplement dealing with Christmas books.

FIGHT OR ABDICATE!

The cause of temperance pleased the people, but the cause of the brewer pleased the Lords. Such is the sum and substance of the history of the Licensing Bill, and of the best part of a year's Parliamentary work. The fate of the Bill is not even left to the House of Lords. It is settled at Lansdowne House. True, there are items of interest, one might say of influence, among the Peers that might be supposed to weigh in favor of a great social reform. There is the Archbishop of Canterbury. There is the almost unanimous voice of the Bench of Bishops. There are lay Conservative peers of weight, standing, and ability. There is Lord St. Aldwyn, a former Chancellor of the Exchequer, whom one would not suspect of rash and revolutionary views on the taxation of vested interests. There is Lord Milner, who is not precisely a Radical. There is Lord Balfour of Burleigh, whom one does not deem a Socialist. But with the Peers these are unconsidered trifles. Their voices will be heard. The courtesies of debate will be afforded them. But res judicata est. The case is decided before the debate. Sentence first, trial afterwards, is the method of Lansdowne House. The Conservative peers have been pleased to stand for what they consider property, that is to say, for the inviolability of a vested interest in the degradation of the masses and the impoverishment of the nation. Eyes have they, but they will not see the ruin of the million. Ears have they, but they will not hear the arguments of the Commons. Nor will they listen to the counsel of Bishop, of Nonconformist leader, of high ex-officials of their own party, of moderate men throughout the country concerned for no party advantage, but for the common good. Their appeal is to no element of moral or religious force in our society. They stand for the naked interests of finance as rooted in that habit which, above all others, retards the healthy development of their country, and handicaps it in the struggle of nations. Should proposals be made for the benefit of the needy, for the relief of the unemployed, or the support of the aged, they have much to say of the improvidence of the working class and the amount that they spend in drink. But when the working classes, speaking through their representatives, urge that this temptation be abated, and that the law of the land be at least on the side of sobriety, they fling back the request in their faces.

In cutting themselves off from the moral support of society, the Lords have written their own doom. It may be long deferred, for reform moves slowly and is crossed by frequent intervals of reaction. But the gage is now fairly flung down, and the Liberal Party must either take it up or abdicate. That the contest should have been deliberately entered on two years ago is a view advocated consistently from the earliest issues of The Nation, and but too sadly justified by the present result. The former defiances of the Lords were met with strong language—and inaction. Whenever the Lords destroyed something, the Government went on to something else. The result is what all could foresee. The Lords have gone on from strength to strength till they have established themselves not by law, but by practice, and by the tacit admission, couched in actions that speak more clearly than words, of those responsible for Liberal policy. If we warn the Lords that they have made the question of their power a life or death issue for democracy, we would also warn Liberal Ministers and Liberal members that what the country will now expect of them is not speech but action. Futile anger is the most contemptible of human emotions, and the objurgations of Liberal members who would not risk the sacrifice of place, Liberal members who would not risk the loss of seats in an encounter which has been challenged for two years, merely move the laughter and contempt of the electorate. The best thing the parliamentary party can do is to recognise in silence that by repeatedly turning the other cheek to the smiter it has brought this insult on itself, and, recognising this, to lay its plans without delay for vindicating its own position as champion of the principle of self-government. It must first recognise that it is no longer possible for the present Parliament to run its full course. It must admit that in a democracy nothing fails like failure, and that the cup which it fills by continuing to pass abortive Bills will be not the cup of wrath against the Lords, but the cup of ridicule for its own impotence. It is, in short, impossible that the present situation can continue, and from this moment onwards preparations must be made for the appeal to the people. The next Budget must, of course, be put through. It is indeed the first step in the campaign, for it will contain the first reply of the Commons on the Licensing Question. The task of dealing with the monopoly value was worth postponing for fourteen years as a means of regaining complete public control of the liquor traffic. But as that avenue of reform is barred, there is no reason why the equitable adjustment of taxation should be delayed beyond the spring of next year. The Chancellor of the Exchequer will find himself by grace of the peers in the enjoyment of a new and rich source of revenue, and the immediate problem of financing social reform will be sensibly lightened. Incidentally, there is little doubt that the adequate taxation of monopoly values will have an indirect effect in reducing the number of public houses, and facilitating the working of the existing provisions for compensation. It will be something done for temperance reform, and a great stroke for financial justice. The problem of the full resumption of popular control must await the decision of the constitutional issue.

The preparation of the Budget is, therefore, the first act in the campaign. Simultaneously it will be possible to develop the social programme of the Government, who should have the report of the Poor Law Commission in their hands in ample time for the legislative work of next session. They will also be able to lay before the country their scheme for the revision of local rating in a Valuation Bill, and with this record of work done they will go to the electors on the supreme issue of the constitution. We assume that their proposals for the adjustment of the relation of the Houses will be embodied in a Bill, and that if returned to power they will not continue in office without a specific pledge from the King of support in carrying such a Bill into law. Indeed, whatever the event, we cannot imagine Liberal Ministers again assuming office without such a pledge. On the showing of the past three years the Lords have become the arbiters of legislation, and the centre of gravity in the constitution has shifted from the Commons to Lansdowne House. Liberal Ministers responsible for the government of the country are set to administer laws which they deem unjust, and which they are pledged to repeal, but which by the action of an irresponsible body they are powerless to alter. This is to undertake responsibilities without the power to discharge them, and that is a position in which no one should place himself or be placed. The old understandings which made it possible have crumbled away. The Lords have defined the issue. It will take more than one General Election to decide it. While the cause of democracy and responsible government is advancing through the world, the Mother of Parliaments finds herself entangled in the web spun by long-past history. She will win free, though not, it may be, without many a struggle and many a sacrifice. But one thing is certain, that the position is one in which it is only the party which will sacrifice much, only the leaders who will risk all, that can count on the sustained loyalty and devotion of the people to whom they owe their strength.

SHALL WE BUILD AGAINST AMERICA?

It can no longer be doubted that a serious internal difficulty has been added to the fight which the Government maintains against the forces of Reaction and Protection. If we recur to it, it is because we fear that the Ministry may have placed a weapon of power in its enemies' hands. Let us state the situation with regard to the Navy as it existed before the Prime Minister's replies to Mr. Lee on the reading of the two-Power standard, and as it exists to-day. With slight variations of phrase, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's reading of the standard had been echoed by his lieutenants—by Mr. Asquith, by Lord Tweedmouth, and not least conspicuously, by Sir Edward Grey. All these statesmen had agreed that a two-Power standard should be maintained; but all were content that we should think rationally of the situation abroad, and protect ourselves only against dangers which seemed likely and proper objects of care. We were to build against "reasonable" and "probable" combinations of Powers. The great advantage had thus been secured that the Navy had ceased to be a subject of acute controversy. The Tories knew that its actual constitution approached nearer to a three-Power than a two-Power standard. Strong Navy men like Lord Brassey and Mr. T. A. Brassey even complained that there was an excess both in matériel and in personnel. Sir William White and other experts expressed general satisfaction as to strength, though not as to the use of that strength. Liberals and friends of peace and economy hoped much from the growth of the ideas of arbitration and disarmament, from the prospect of securing immunity for private property at sea—the main cause, in Lord Lochee's view, of the existence of large navies—from the grouping of Powers in combinations based on the preservation of peace. It was recognised that the enlarged German programme created one direct and grave difficulty. But it was not disputed that British superiority to the German Navy, at all points of that programme, must be secured, and it was clear that our resources enabled us easily to attain that end.

This was the situation. What is the situation? It is one of grave perplexity. The Opposition, moved, we are convinced, by party more than by national ends, began to re-agitate the question of the Navy. As a result, the Prime Minister has now twice in the House of Commons declared, in answer to a pronounced Tory politician, that the standard of strength which he accepted was that of the combined strengths in capital ships of the two next strongest Powers, with ten per cent. over, and that, to quote the phrase which Mr. Asquith adopted on Monday from Mr. Lee's lips, the two Powers meant those that happened to be strongest, "whichever they may be and wherever situated." He said, indeed, that he regarded the statement as identical with his earlier declaration that we must hold the sea against a "reasonably possible combination." But we have to point out that, so far from being identical, these two formulæ, on the face of it, are contradictory. The United States and Germany are the next two strongest Powers. Are they a "reasonably possible" combination? If Mr. Asquith answers "No," and if his and his predecessor's first definition holds, he must nullify his second formula, or he throws over his first formula in favor of his second. If he answers "Yes," his first and second formulæ do indeed agree, but we are formally invited, contrary to Sir Edward Grey's dictum of 1903 and to every previous Liberal declaration, to build against the States as well as against Germany; that is to say, a people of forty odd millions is called upon to provide a force superior to that levied by 140 millions. On that proposition we have two remarks to make. The first is that the people of Great Britain cannot do it. The second is that the Liberal Party will not try to do it. They will never consent to build against America.

It may be said that these are the academics of the subject, that the formula, "two next strongest," is meaningless; that America is not included, or only included on a mysteriously diminished scale; and that in effect the contemplated naval programmes of 1909 and 1910 will not be enlarged as a consequence of Mr. Asquith's re-reading of a not too precise expression of naval policy. We devoutly hope that this may be the case, and that we are not tied to a full numerical superiority to the combined German and American fleets. Unfortunately, the question has already passed into the region of practice. The Conservative Party, assuming that they have obtained the mastery of naval policy, have at once put the new formula into figures, and called upon the Government to make them good. On Tuesday Lord Cawdor, the last Conservative head of the Admiralty, accepted Mr. Asquith's definition, and demanded its immediate application. So far from declaring the two phrases to be identical, he insisted that they were "alternative." Quoting Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's statement in 1906, in which he stated that the likelihood of Powers being allied or opposed to us and to each other was essential to the calculation, Lord Cawdor added that now we "had done with qualifications such as that," and that the Prime Minister had adopted the "general" and the "only safe" basis of naval strength. The standard accepted, the next business was to apply it with all possible speed. The Government must build "six or seven first-class ships," i.e., Dreadnoughts, for completion in 1911, and the same number for 1912. As Dreadnoughts are not available for all kinds of waters, a large complement of auxiliary vessels would, of course, be needed. The meaning of this is obvious. The Government's normal term of office comes to an end in 1910. Within that period Mr. Lloyd George is required to find the money for building twelve or fourteen Dreadnoughts in the Budgets of next year and the year after. The cost will be from twenty-four to twenty-eight millions. The incidental increase in the Naval Estimates must approach five millions for each year. Lord Cawdor's estimate is indeed much too moderate to meet the demands of his own policy. The combined naval budgets of America and Germany are about forty millions; in that case we must face an annual increase of over eight millions in our own Naval Estimates. It is a fact of no small omen that the population of the Powers against whom this irrational formula of the "two next strongest" binds us to build, increases more quickly than our own. And, if we examine the American case alone, we have to admit two factors of the utmost seriousness. The States have just transferred the centre of their naval power from the Atlantic to the Pacific. As a consequence, they have now to construct a second Atlantic fleet, an enterprise to which Mr. Taft, we imagine, is as much committed as Mr. Roosevelt, and for which the high Protectionist system, under the special circumstances of American industry, provides the necessary funds.

And what is our case? The Government have not begun to finance Old Age Pensions. They budgetted for six millions. It is clear that they will have to account for eight. And they have committed themselves to a large extension of the system. They contemplate a system of working-class insurance. They are negotiating a costly deal in education with the Church and the English Catholics. The needs of the Civil Service, the expense of administration on a reforming basis, go up by leaps and bounds. The looked-for economies on the Army are swallowed up in the cost of the Territorial force—Retrenchment is dead in the third year of the Government's term of power. If the end was inevitable, it was never the purpose of the Liberal Party that economy should be killed by the demands of the war services, and a Radical Chancellor lie crushed under the shields of the Admirals and the Generals. What seems to us more unfortunate even than the directly material consequences of the adoption of the Cawdor formula of Naval Power is that the policy and the ideas which it involves are such as the Conservative Party naturally supports and the Liberal Party naturally opposes. A party, no more than an individual, can thrive on food which is repugnant to it. It is hateful for Liberals even to think of building against the United States; it is hateful for them to think of material force as governing the world without modification by moral and political influences; it is hateful to see the control of Liberal policy, on a subject which touches closely the almost passionate cult of arbitration, slipping into Tory hands; it would be unendurable for them to reflect that a Liberal Government, by the double act of refusing to abandon capture at sea and of fixing our armaments at a point which the pride of two of the most ambitious nations in the world will never allow us to occupy in peace, had stereotyped naval armaments and built up new walls of estrangement between the State systems of the world, and with our own kin across the Atlantic. The majority of 1906 subsists, standing on the double ground of Free Trade and Social Reform. And if a large section of that majority, fully devoted to the general purposes of the Administration, and conscious of no breach of loyalty to it, are gravely perturbed, it is because they feel that the new reading of the two-Power standard raises a competitor before which the claims of the people must sink and fall; and that only a Government bold enough to tax their food, and to take very heavy toll of their labor, can possibly maintain it.

YOUNG TURKEY AND YOUNG PERSIA.

At the luncheon recently given by the Balkan Committee to Ahmed Riza Bey and Dr. Nazim, nothing was more significant than the marked and repeated expressions of sympathy and solidarity which both these leaders of Young Turkey publicly bestowed on a Persian exile who happened to be present. It was a brave and chivalrous action. Themselves in need of aid and in quest of sympathy, they went out of their way to link their cause with that of a defeated and friendless people. In the midst of delicate negotiations with one of the two Powers which hold the fate of Persia in their hands, they burdened their requests for Turkey with a plea for a neighbor in distress. In the face of a public opinion which is rarely kindly to failure, they interrupted their own triumph to give their hand to a fugitive and a suppliant. Nor were they slow to repeat to diplomatists what they had said to their unofficial hosts, and their acts have given meaning to their words. For as Ahmed Riza Bey told the Balkan Committee, one of the first cares of the Young Turks after their success was to send representatives into Persia to assure its struggling Parliamentary party of their support. This factor in the uncertain Persian situation is among the most important with which English diplomacy has to reckon.

It has now embarked, as Sir Edward Grey once more repeated in his speech at Scarborough, on a new course in its dealings with Turkey. It claims to be, and most sincerely is, the disinterested friend of the new movement, and it has inaugurated a relationship which ought not to end with the present crisis, and may prove to be the decisive condition in the making of a new East.

Public opinion in the Balkans has cultivated during the past generation an habitual and documented cynicism. Its natural tendency would be to assume that this English friendship is in its own way as opportunist and as interested as was that of Germany for the old régime. It can easily discover cogent and probable reasons why British Imperialists should lend a selfish and therefore conditional support to Young Turkey. She may become a barrier against the extension of Pan-Teutonic ambitions eastwards ; she would have it in her power, if crossed, to make herself highly objectionable in Egypt, and, lastly, she influences the loyalty of the Mohammedans on whom the Indian bureaucracy tends to lean as a make-weight to the radical Hindoos. So easy is it to interpret our new enthusiasm for the Turkish reformers as a desire to conclude a mere marriage of convenience. Happily, the Young Turkish leaders are not cynics ; they are, on the contrary, idealists of a slightly doctrinaire type. In judging us they will apply a just and simple test of consistency. If they see that we support a Liberal Persia in adversity, as we have supported a Liberal Turkey in triumph, they will conclude that we are not mere fair-weather friends, and that our motive is that of good citizens of the world who desire to see a free East and a reformed Islam. If, on the contrary, they see us abandon a struggling sister people in the interests of our diplomatic dealings with autocratic Russia, they will conclude, not unjustly, that even when we happen to befriend them, we are merely playing some Bismarckian game to load the scales of the balance of power. Such a conviction saps confidence, begets an answering cynicism, and chills the natural impulse of gratitude.

For the moment we believe that the danger of a Russian occupation of Northern Persia has ceased to be acute. Russia has realised that such a step would be disliked in England and resented in Turkey, and she needs the goodwill of both if she is to pursue, with any chance of success, the rôle which she has once more resumed as the champion of the Balkan Slavs. But in this kind of gambling Russia is in the position of the bank, which stands in the end to gain by almost every combination of chances. Her agents help the Shah to destroy Parliament; she rules with him as her tool. Officially she advocates a Constitution, and her advice is rejected; she wins the right to enforce it. The rebels succeed in dominating a stretch of territory; it is red ruin and revolution, and she must intervene to restore order. The rebels fail, and the Shah's bandit horsemen plunder friend and foe alike, Persian and Russian; again it is anarchy and a pretext for intervention. Nothing, in short, save a success for one side, so rapid and complete as to bring no incidental disorder with it, would quite remove the risk of intervention. But everything tends to show that the struggle will be long and difficult. The Parliament has on its side intelligence, character, and numbers. The Shah has his foreign advisers, his Russian officers, the Russian Bank, and the disciplined Russo-Persian Cossack brigade. To the incidents of the past week it is difficult to attach any serious meaning. Some luckless Persian notables were driven "between files of executioners" to the royal presence, and there informed that since a Constitution is against the Koran, it will "on no pretext" be revived. It was the same Shah who, five times in succession, swore on the Koran to observe the Constitution. Only two weeks before he had promised to summon the Parliament again. A day later, a further change occurred, and at the moment of writing the Parliament has once more been promised. It is not difficult to guess what had happened in the interval. At the time of the Reval visit the Russian Minister appears to have given the Shah to understand, probably without warrant, that Russia and England had guaranteed his personal position. That is why he dared his coup d'état, and that also is why the Parliament, fearing foreign intervention, refrained then from resisting him by force. We should judge from Sir Edward Grey's answer in the House on Tuesday, in which he threw upon the Shah the full "responsibility" for his own acts, that this guarantee has now been withdrawn, if it was ever given. But on the Shah's latest promise neither we nor the Persians can place the smallest reliance. Even if the Mejliss were to be summoned, it could not under present conditions be fairly elected, nor, if it met, could it deliberate freely while Colonel Liakhoff commands the guns which destroyed its predecessor. The only hope for Persia is that the very orderly and capable little Parliamentary army, which now holds Tabriz and the North, may be allowed gradually to extend its authority over the rest of Persia. That, however, can hardly occur, unless the Russian Liberals succeed in their well-meant efforts to procure the recall of this Cossack colonel, whom even the "Novoye Vremya" has denounced as "a public nuisance."

But, after all, have the Persians deserved the sympathy which able Orientalists like Professor Browne, and near neighbors like Ahmed Riza Bey, claim for them? The question must not be put in a form too absolute. It is not necessary to prove that they are either philosophers or heroes. For Persia three fates are possible—corruption, incompetence, and cruelty under the Shah, a régime of efficient but often brutal repression under the Russian satraps who at present hold down the neighboring Caucasus, or a Parliamentary régime. However defective the last might be, if judged by Western standards, it would at least hold out more prospect of development and happiness than the other two. A system of government must be measured by its possible alternatives. But we are clear that the late Parliament did good and promising work. It established, with the aid of the more Liberal clergy, a system of tolerance and equality from which the persecuted heretics of every sect, Babis, Zoroastrians, and Armenians, profited as fully as the Christians have done in Turkey. It completely broke the local tyranny of the governors and princelings, who were the worst scourge of the country, and set up as a check to them a complete machinery of local elective councils. These were called "Anjumans," a word which in Persian means both council and club—hence the ignorant charge that Persia was governed by revolutionary clubs. If that accusation is to weigh with us, it would damn the Turks as completely as the Persians, for they at present are undoubtedly governed by a self-elected committee. But perhaps the best, as it was the most dangerous, achievement of the reformers, was that they succeeded in diverting to public uses the revenues which hitherto had fed in a poor country the magnificence of the Shah, the royal princes, and the army of grooms and lackeys which hung upon the Court. That was their success; it was also their ruin. Finally, without imposing new taxation, the Parliament did succeed in producing something like a budget that balanced. There is, we think, in this record, if not a complete proof of capacity, at least an earnest of good intentions and an augury of progress. If, after all, our obstinate English realism contends that the Young Persians failed where the Young Turks succeeded, an answer lies on the surface of events. The Young Turks succeeded not because they could manage a Parliament —their ability to do that has yet to be proved—but simply because they had a native army to win and use. The Young Persians failed because they had Russian officers against them. Their record is fair enough and brave enough to deserve a second chance under fair conditions. They do not ask us to intervene to aid them. They ask only to be left to work out their own salvation.

THE PATH TO EDUCATIONAL PEACE.

We hope that the new atmosphere in education, or, perhaps, we ought to say, in religion, of which Mr. Runciman spoke on Wednesday night, will so far prevail that the parties to this old quarrel will endeavour to realise what a compromise means. At present they seem in some danger of forgetting it. If each section is to regard only what it has lost of its claim, and to have no thought of what it has gained, and if it attaches no value, or very small value, to the attainment of religious peace in the schools, it is clear that there can be no settlement. The Nonconformist will then think only of the right of entry, and not at all of popular control and the abolition of tests and rate-aid for denominational schools. The High Churchman will merely see Cowper-Templeism standing in the place where it ought not, and will avert his eyes from the wide provisions for Church children in the public schools. The teachers will consider only the case of those instructors who are left outside the national system and unrelieved of tests, and will ignore the great majority who become free men under the State. The Roman Catholics will forget that the nation, while leaving them complete liberty to retain their special educational system, will all but pay for the maintenance of their schools, and they will grumble because every farthing of the cost is not made up to them. While Secularists complain that preference is given to one form of religion, it will always be possible for Nonconformists to argue that in this district the Catechism does too well, and for Churchmen to retort that in another undenominationalism is unduly favored. And it is quite clear that if the Anglican revolt against the Primate, and the Nonconformist rising against their Consulting Committee, are powerful enough, the Bill must fail, because war will merely be transferred from Parliament to the schools, and a campaign of local sniping will take the place of the armed truce of to-day. It is, therefore, of the utmost importance that the new Settlement Committee should increasingly draw within its influence those whose minds are fixed on ending the squabble in the schools, and imposing, if possible, an acceptable working system. These men must discover what peace is worth and how it can best be maintained, remembering that if Mr. Runciman's Bill, or something like it, fails, no solution remains save the secular one. Everything else—a universal system with checks, right of entry based on the will of the parent, contracting out—will have been tried and will have broken down. If the different forms of faith can find no common ground within the school door, they must keep outside it. And it is useless any longer to pretend that any heroic settlement is possible. The local authorities will not enter on a great building policy, leaving the Church schools to die. It will cost too much, and the local opposition will be too severe. And on the other hand, the Church cannot, in decency, challenge a revival of passive resistance, and oppose the logic of the demand that public control shall accompany public support. And finally, the educationalist has now a right to step in, and say that the march of educational development shall be frustrated no longer. These forms of pressure, taken together, represent an intellectual and a moral movement of great power, of which Mr. Runciman and the Primate have been wise to take account.

It is, of course, possible to find defects in Mr. Runciman's Bill which are real, and which might grow to formidable dimensions unless its administration is marked by a substantial measure of good-will. If Church and Chapel will go quarrelling into the settlement, it is easy to see that the dangers which the teachers see in the permission to volunteer for religious instruction may become real enough. It is quite true that no State premium is set upon the giving of this instruction. But a local authority with a strong Church flavoring may give the preference to teachers who will volunteer; and, on the other hand, a body where the Nonconformists are powerful may look with favor on a candidate who will not. Nor is the substance of the proposal without its dangers. We see that the period of religious instruction has been lengthened out to a fixed, uninterrupted three-quarters of an hour, a period, as Mr. Graham Wallas points out in the columns of The Nation, far too long for children, and contrasting somewhat scandalously with the time-table for prayers which prevails in our public and middle-class schools. And it is not without misgiving that we see religious teaching made compulsory, subject, of course, to a conscience clause. It is most important that English children should not forget the Bible, with its entrancing atmosphere of story and parable, as French children have practically forgotten it. But the old technical, literal use of the Bible does not stand where it did in the intelligence and feeling of the people, and if this is pressed too hard, a revolt of parents and teachers will sooner or later arise. Here, again, something may be hoped from the co-operation of the churches, if co-operate they will. But unless this tacit assent to the concordat is obtained, a totally new situation will arise, in which the average man will decide that statesmanship and ecclesiasticism do not meet, that religious sentiment is too profoundly divided, the dogmatic quarrel too disturbing, to find any common ground in the public school.

THE SPEECH OF THE PROVINCE.

A SERIES of lectures on the Art of Speaking is in progress at London University. The main purpose is "to kill Cockney," which is said to have infected the speech of all classes in the Capital. We have not had the pleasure of hearing any of the discourses; but if we may judge from an extra-mural explanation by the Professor, Dr. H. H. Hulbert, some questionable doctrines underlie the art which is being taught. "A common fault," says the teacher, "is 'wot' instead of 'what.'" Is the usage really a fault? Fastidious persons declare it to be so; but none of them, it would appear, has considered the matter analytically. In the English language there is many a word that cannot be pronounced as it is spelt. "Phlegm" is an example. The "g" in that word could be sounded only if we allowed ourselves to slip in a vowel between it and the "m." We could say phlegam, or phlegem, or phlegum, or phlegim, or phlegom; but we do not. That is because of the rule that when a consonant cannot be pronounced we leave it to be taken for granted. Why, then, is anyone perturbed by the London way of saying "what"? If the word were spelt "hwat" we could give due value, in sound, to the "h"; but, being where it is, the "h" must necessarily be silent unless, breaking our rule, we put a vowel before it, and say, for example, 'wi'haut.' "Which," "when," "where," and other words, are in the same case. Our correspondence columns, in moderation, are open to those who would argue against what has just been said; but we beg for candor before anyone takes a protestant pen in hand. Obviously the fact is that no one in the generations of fastidious persons who have been deploring the London w'ot, w'ich, w'en, w'ere, has taken the trouble to be sure that he knew what he was talking about. He has merely been going on with a parrot cry. He has not noticed the arrangement of the consonants in the words. Thus, if we are to think of the schools and Cocagne as being in conflict, it is the academic persons, not the Cockneys, who in this entertaining duel receive the first palpable hit.

On the other hand, natives of London and those of surrounding regions do certainly use the letter h in other relations, despitefully. They have two distinct systems of maltreatment. One of these is illustrated in the story of a Scot who was hospitably entertained at a Hertfordshire farm-house. "'Ave a little more 'am?" said the farmer to his guest. "O, father!" exclaimed the son, "don't say ''am': say ''am.'" "They both think they are saying ''am'!" the farmer's wife remarked, smiling. It does not seem possible to find a reason for the habit of leaving the h silent in such words as ham. On first thoughts one might imagine it attributable to a feeling that the aspirate is dissonant; but that surmise would last for a moment only. It would have to be discarded on perceiving that, as the Londoner in many a case puts an h in sound where there is none in letters, he has neither a natural nor an acquired objection to the aspirate. Almost as readily as he will speak of an "'owling gale," he will tell you of "the howl that was 'ooting in the helms." There we have an illustration of the other systematic misuse. It is all very perplexing. There appears to be no possible theory that will account at once for the absence of the aspirate in words of one set and its presence in those of the other. Still, we do have what may be called an arbitrary glimmering. Whilst persons of all classes incline to ignore h's in words which have them, only persons of certain classes put aspirates where they should not be. An omitted h is not, as a rule, incompatible with what is generally recognised as being good education or good breeding; but a superfluous h is not so easily overlooked. It is a fault which many of us shudder at the thought of committing. Equally distressing is our London difficulty in the matter of certain vowel sounds. One morning we heard a girl, a "lady's companion," saying to her mistress, who was glancing over "The Daily Telegraph," "Does the pyper sy it's gyin' to ryn todie?" Dr. Hulbert says that the London habit of turing a's into i's as in "sigh" is due to our "placing the lips in a wrong position." He is able, he says, to prescribe a position which would render the fault impossible. Let us hope that he has a similar cure for Edinburgh young ladies of the same class. Their simpering way of sounding the a's, whilst wholly different from the London damsel's, is as far removed from what one might call the ideal.

Where is the ideal to be found? Ah, that's the rub! The art of speaking has no unvarying standard. There is no town or other place in the United Kingdom that has a manner of speech which is acknowledged to be an infallible example. No town, no place even, lays claim to such an eminence. A peculiarity about all attempts at reform in the art of speaking is that they are invariably efforts of the home-mission kind. In religion and in politics it is always other people, never ourselves, that we endeavor to convert; but in the matter of the right way of speaking charity in all cases begins at home. Many generations ago the barristers, the merchants, the bankers, and the holy-orders men of Edinburgh solemnly went to a school, established by one of themselves, who had lived much in London, to "learn English," and their descendants ever since have been constantly, though less formally, striving to shed their local peculiarities of utterance. Now we have the English themselves, at London University, engaged in precisely the same enterprise. This makes one think. Are we justified in our assumption that a uniform manner of speech is desirable? Any theory that we are is ill to reconcile with the fact that every class in the community of the Kingdom seems bent upon having its speech made to conform with that of some other class. About this, when one comes to think seriously, there seems to be no possibility of question. Londoners do not dislike the Scotch speech or the Irish; they like it. The Scots do not dislike the Irish speech or the English; they like it. The Irish do not dislike the English or the Scotch; they like it. What each part of the Kingdom is not sure about is it own variant of the common tongue. What the Englishman, the Scot, the Irishman positively dislikes is any patois of English, Scotch, Irish, which seems a parody of his own way of speaking in his own country. That which each of us is averse from is either not offensive to the people in either of the other countries or is positively pleasing. This is evident in the delight which many readers in all parts of the Kingdom find in the writings of Mr. Kipling and other masters in the art of reproducing dialect. If the dialect were transliterated into conventional English, many a highly popular book would be wholly without appeal. We must not press this point very far; but, regarded in conjunction with the other fact which we have noted, the fact that each part of the Kingdom likes the speech of either of the others at least as much as it likes the best of its own, it means a good deal. Except the few who are specially held up to derision or to contempt, the characters in dialect novels are never affected in their speech. They are racy of the soil. They are genuine in their manner of expression; unconscious of it and unashamed. It would thus appear that unobjectionable speech comes from sincerity based on character. If a man is insincere, his speech is affected; if he is ignoble, it is mean. All other peculiarities are a trouble not to the nation at large but only to the provinces which are self-conscious of them.

THE GENTLE ART OF FIGHTING.

War seems a silly argument, but the art of war is a glorified commonsense. The principles of strategy are as certain as the stars in their courses; like the propositions of Euclid, they have only to be stated to be believed. Yet at first sight you would not guess them, any more than you would guess that the square on the hypotenuse is equal to the squares on the sides containing the right angle, and as many of our generals stumble over a campaign as over the Asses' Bridge. The art of killing has not changed since man returned from battle red like Nature in tooth and claw, or first discovered that a jag of flint in a cloven stick was good for splitting skulls. Yet each age enters as a novice into the malign obscurity of combat, and the staff officer, sublime with eyeglass and scarlet tabs, repeats the errors of a hairy anthropoid. For everything is easier than the obvious, and only by fear of death can commonsense be hammered into man's intelligence.

"Let the soldier always study Hannibal and Cæsar, Gustavus Adolphus, Turenne, and Frederick," said Napoleon, implying that the principles of warfare are permanent; and to those masters we have now added his own name, Stonewall Jackson's, and Moltke's. Mankind has never killed itself in mass by different means than theirs. To keep your forces united, to leave no weak point unguarded, to strike for important positions quickly and with overwhelming energy—any fool could see those principles must be true, though it might take a general to act on them. They are all true—true to satiety; but it was with a hopeful sense of fresh discovery that we turned to a strange little treatise on strategic art which has just appeared. It is "The Book of War," by those ancient masters Sun and Wu, now translated by Captain Calthrop of the Field Artillery (Murray), and to be had for half-a-crown. Of all nations the Chinese are most topsy-turvy. In mind they are our antipodes, and hang head downwards. It is believed that in China the mountains also stand on their apex, like pyramids reversed, and rivers flow upward from the sea into the hills. So here, if anywhere, we might expect to find something new and strange in the ways of killing. For if two straight lines can enclose an enemy, or if part of an army is greater than the whole, it can only be in China.

Nor are we disappointed. China has one fine start in warlike originality. Other nations have openly admired the warrior; they have allowed him to wear brilliant clothes, to receive more affection than other men, and to walk about with his dangerous instruments unconcealed. Not so the Chinese. They have never dissimulated their contempt for the military man. Incredible as it must appear to a mess ball, they think nothing of him. Beside the mere scholar he has no chance, for to the scholar every position of State or society is open, if only he has a strong enough digestion to survive the examinations. And, indeed, though the authors of this treatise were mercenary soldiers, their ideal of a happy warrior was a very clerkly knight. Wu himself is described as clothed in the raiment of a scholar, and in his chapter on generals he says:—

> "The leader of an army is one who is master of both arms and letters. He who is both brave and tender can be entrusted with troops."

It is true that Sun does not like exceeding graciousness and familiarity on the part of a general, because they show that he has lost the confidence of his men. But through all the precepts there breathes a certain air of gentleness very different from the military language we know. It is not so long since, at a moment of crisis in the Far East, a Pekin correspondent telegraphed: "There will be peace; the kite-flying season has begun." When the South African War was close upon us, why did it not occur to ourselves that the oyster season had commenced and we were remembering the grotto? What a saving, if only we had thought of that in time!

In the Chinese text-book there are many evidences of this martial gentleness. "The supreme art of war," we are told, "is to subdue the enemy without fighting," and from this definition it naturally follows that "war is a thing of pretence." Like their descendant, Ah Sin, the generals Sun and Wu were peculiar for ways that were dark. But no one will under-rate the strategic power of bluff who remembers French's thin line at Colesberg holding back the invader for weeks with splendid lies, and as to subduing the enemy without fighting, that was, after all, the Boer method. More strange to us is Sun's lavish praise of spies. Their proper use is called "the Mysterious Thread," "the Lord's Treasure." Wonderful, indeed, we are told, is the power of spies, and their service was the most highly rewarded. To us it seems queer, for we now use "spy" in a bad sense, and only for the enemy's agents. Before the South African War we sent two soldiers disguised as coal prospectors through the Transvaal and Free State, but we did not talk of them as spies. We called them Intelligence Officers, and have since appointed both to high positions, which they well deserved. Our only mistake was that we forgot to read their report.

Bluff and spies, though they do not blaze in martial glory, are useful instruments still. But what can we say of another precept that sounds even more gentle:—

> "Do not interfere with an enemy who has struck camp and is about to retire," says Sun. "When surrounding an enemy allow him an outlet. Do not press a desperate enemy."

If there are any laws of strategy more certain than others, they are the necessity of striking an enemy who is about to retire, of surrounding an enemy so as to allow him no outlet, and of pressing him, whether he is desperate or not. If Joubert had remembered those laws when the Dundee brigade under Yule was retreating through mountains to join Sir George White, he could have crushed us (to use the Chinese metaphor) like an egg under the fall of a grindstone, and our reconquest of the country would have begun from the beach at Durban. If Buller had remembered them instead of saying, "Damn pursuit!" when the enemy was in headlong retreat after the relief of Ladysmith, we might have been saved eighteen months of regrettable incidents.

But Sun's precepts must be taken with another set, their converse and equally astonishing. It is a truism of warfare to keep communications open, never to let men feel they are cut off from support or retirement, never to place them in a position of utter desperation. It is true that Napoleon exclaimed, "How many seeming impossibilities have been accomplished by men whose only resource was death!" but he was illustrating his maxim against authorising officers to surrender on the field, and he himself never courted situations of despair. Sun inculcates them. "The general," he boldly says, "should place his armies in a desperate position." He should cut his own communications, he should burn his ships, or (again to follow the Chinese) he should take away the ladder from the men on the roof. Sun would deliberately put his army into the position of Burrows at Maiwand, or Wilson on the Shangani, or the detached force at Nicholson's Nek. It sounds insane, but we must take account of his reasons. "In desperate places," he says, "soldiers lose the sense of fear, and if there is no place of refuge, there will be no wavering." On the next page we find the still more significant passage:—

> "When the order for attack is given, the collars of those who are sitting may be wet with tears; tears may roll down the cheeks of those reclining; yet these men, in a desperate place, will fight with the courage of Chu and Knei."

Who were Chu and Knei, bravest of fighters? In what battles long ago did they prove their courage? Who, for that matter, were Sun and Wu, masters of warfare? Dimly in their precepts we discern them trampling about in undiscovered China, ignorant that, while they trampled, Greece was turning back the waves of Asia at Marathon and Salamis. Behind them moved the army—a fixed number of 1,000 light chariots with four horses each, 1,000 leather-covered chariots, and 100,000 armored men, equipt according to their height or strength with spears and shields, bows and catapults, banners and standards (those weapons of terror!), while drums sounded the orders, like our bugles, and bells cheered them on. So much entertainment of guests was required, so much lacquer and glue for repairs, that a thousand pieces of gold would be spent on the army in one day. But the splendor of the sight was well worth the cost:—

> "The green dragons should be placed on the left, and the white tigers on the right; the red sparrows in front; the snakes and tortoises behind; the pole star above; and the soldiers will look to the standard."

On rice they were fed, and in this splendor they advanced to battle, their collars wet with tears. Obviously we have a picture of mercenary armies employed by rival little States not much more savagely opposed to each other than our political parties, and not in the least inclined to lay down their lives for their cause. That is why they cried when the order for battle came, and why they refused to fight their best as long as they could see the road behind was open for running. They remind us of the Italian States when the French came storming over the Alps upon them, and artistic princes complained that these barbarians actually killed men in war, regardless of the considerable expense invested in every soldier. Or they remind us of the Austrian archduke who hated war because it spoilt his beautiful troops. Or, again, they remind us of the highly esteemed amenities of political life. It is a gentle art of fighting, a war of pretence, a strategy that leaves an outlet for the enemy's escape and is glad to see him go. There is no touch here of that consuming passion which has possessed nations like the French struggling for their freedom. From that kind of war arise those eternal rules which, as the Chinese say, can be obeyed without consulting an oracle—rules like Napoleon's maxims: never do what the enemy wishes; in every battle strike with your whole force; never fail in pursuit; crush the enemy like an egg under a grindstone. Perhaps, in other than military conflicts, these are not bad rules to remember.

THE GOOD SAMARITAN.

So long as sin and death and pain are in the world, there will be, even in the best constructed Utopia, a certain road, not marked in any authentic road map, although referred to once as running between Jericho and Jerusalem—a road we all know. And travelling on it are priests and Levites—also thieves (you may still recognise them under an infinite number of disguises). There are wounded people, and there is the good Samaritan, who crosses over to help as instinctively as most of us pass by on the other side—the man who is willing, and eager, to share his oil and wine, and go on foot, that another may ride.

Yet probably no one realises better than the good Samaritan how much there is to be said in favor of passing by. Sometimes he is tempted to wonder if the other side is not the safe side, even from the standpoint of the wounded man. And he comes to understand why, at the outset, a candid friend said to him:

"Stay where you are. For every wounded man you cross the road to help, a dozen will come over to you. You will never be quit of them. You will never reach Jerusalem, or anywhere else. You will spend your days in dressing wounds and adjusting bandages, and since you are no surgeon, and were never meant to be, you'll do more harm than good. You might as well take your life and pour it into the sand.

"You say it's only a matter of a little oil and wine, and half an hour's journey on foot—then you will be free to continue your journey. You fool, if once you cross over, the weird of the wounded man will be upon you to the end. You will live and move and breathe—and die—with him. You don't know him as I do; he'll claim you, soul and body, before you have done with him. He'll rob you of your heart's desire. Live your own life, and let him alone.

"Let him alone for his own sake too, and for the sake of the public good. It is people like you that rob a nation of its self-respect, its courage and fortitude. Men should learn to take proper precautions, to fight thieves for themselves. And they will never learn the lesson till others give up saving them from the consequences of their own folly. As for the wounded man you want to help—if he recovers unaided, and drags himself home, this disaster will be a warning to him—hard, but salutary. If on the other hand, you play Providence, he will be no wiser next time. But, you say, he may die? What if he does? Who will miss him? He comes of a weak, reckless stock, that ought to die out. Once again, leave him alone."

The good Samaritan listened, but it was not his way to be prudent, save with the unconscious prudence that is not for time, but for eternity. He crossed the road, still eager, still quite confident that he would do more good than harm. How well he remembers! He is still crossing over to the wounded, only his step is less buoyant, for in the years that are behind him, he has made, it seems to him, every blunder that it was possible for anyone to make who really desired to play the part of a good Samaritan. Sometimes he asks himself whether the priest and Levite, who, if they did no good, did little tangible harm, were not, in their own day and generation, wiser than he, and whether the outer darkness of the robbers is not the most fitting place for him.

He is conscious that he has failed through more than folly, he has failed through selfishness. There is a kind of imitation good Samaritan at whom he has mocked, the person who lives for others so tenaciously that if the supply of wounded men ever ran short, he would have to enter into a contract with some predatory firm to supply them, who crosses the road in a purposeful manner, with packets labelled oil and wine so clearly that they can be read at a long distance, save by short-sighted people. He has mocked at that person, but has he never resembled him? Have his own oil and wine never been too obtrusive, too obvious? He pleads guilty to this, and to all other charges.

He has been unduly fastidious in his service to the suffering. He has attended to the surface wounds of attractive people, yet often passed by, oblivious, one in mortal agony. He has been hard, impatient, reproachful, even in his efforts to aid, till he has made the wounded man discern advantages in being left to die. Or, on the other hand, he has swathed in cotton wool and compassion victims who were quite capable of rousing themselves and pursuing their journey.

He has gone on foot for humanity, but in his worse moods he has called attention to the fact that he was tired and lame. He has likewise informed the wounded that he had very little oil and wine left for himself. He has counted the drops as they fell. . . . The bitter fact was that he grudged the whole price of service. He wanted altruism for a servant, not a master—for self's background, not the cross on which self must be crucified. Now he knows better . . . but even now!

Again, he has inflicted, it seems to him, much unnecessary pain. He has hurt when he meant to heal. It was so terribly easy to give the wrong kind of remedy, or at the wrong moment—to pour corrosive on a wound instead of balm. How often his very anxiety made his hand shake, when all depended on a steady hand! How often he proved himself the kind of friend from whom men pray the gods to save them!

He has tried too often, he suspects, to fly his own especial flag over the wounded man—to annex his personality, as a gold-digger "pegs out a claim," to impose upon him his own law of conduct and of spiritual growth. He has exerted an unconscious tyranny, and provoked anarchy. He has demanded some particular response, of gratitude or of character, and roused instead the subtle antagonism that is the protest of the human soul against coercion—an antagonism as inevitable as the repulsion of one electric current by another flowing in an opposite direction. He meant well. There is a story many of us read in childhood with a keen sense of injustice, of a king who put out his hand to protect—not injure—a holy thing, and of his punishment. It is the story of blind, undisciplined goodwill, that profanes the Holy of Holies, and in itself is sacrilege. And the sincere Good Samaritan learns the lesson in due time. He learns that there are wounds which only God can heal, bitterness with which human love may not intermeddle.

Once, he thought himself hardly treated, if the wounded man flung the oil and wine in his face, or, more frequently, accepted both, and hated the giver. Now he begins to see that only a great love can receive, as it gives, ungrudgingly, that constant receiving, without giving, often ends in either degradation or resentment, and that no worthy human being cares to be a mere beneficiary, even of God. He learns to make allowances for wounded folk who at the first are full of gratitude, but, later on, grow querulous, and criticise not only the oil and the wine and the inn, but every weak spot of the man who came to their help. He learns that not only generosity and goodwill, but patience, self-repression, tact, and the persistent effort to realise the standpoint of another, go to the making of a Good Samaritan.

He learns, perhaps, through painful blundering, to give his help subtly and unsuspectedly, and measure his oil and wine by troy weight, not only by avoirdupois, and he divines the power of some fine quintessence, volatile, impalpable, that hardly makes the finest balance quiver, and yet is life-giving. He learns that every visible gift is either betrayed or redeemed by the invisible spirit that prompts it. He learns to draw his cup of cold water from deeper and purer springs, unsullied by tumult, or scorn, or exaction; and he relies more fully on those unseen forces that can neither affront nor degrade.

He ceases to hunger after recognition, but believes in it more. He knows that below all cross-currents of misunderstanding and ignorance, of temperament and time—below all errors on either side, below the hate that springs from secret shame or secret pain, below blind, exacting affection—deep answers deep in the hearts of men, and that when injuries and blunders are forgotten, the memory of goodwill remains—striking its roots into our spiritual, immortal part.

And he believes in his inmost heart that, when all is said and done, the supreme mistake is to think that the other side is the safer. The only side that is really safe is the side of the wounded man, the side of need and suffering. Some of us think that self is at least safe—a kind of terra firma. But self is the ultimate quicksand—the deadliest risk of all.

THE CLOSE OF NOVEMBER.

"November's sky," says the poet, "is chill and drear"; but, barring rain, it is really not so bad a month, if you can spend it in the country. November mists have many beauties and few terrors, provided the smoke of a town does not turn them into fogs.

The latter half of the month is the real doorway of winter. The last leaves blaze into color and fall. The last garden flowers are frost-bitten. The last loitering summer birds disappear; the last autumn songs of the robin die away; the first large flocks of the winter visitors—the field-fares and redwings—scour the meadows. The last bats flit about at dusk after ghostly gnats and small brown moths. Between forenoon mists and an early sunset the hours of daylight are short. Yet when the sun triumphs, its very weakness lends a curious pathos to the beauty of the visible world. Sunlight in October on the fiery copper of the beech leaves and the many-colored foliage—purple dogwood, pink spindleberry, green and yellow hazel, saffron maple, all of them jewelled with scarlet hips and haws in the October hedges—spreads before the eye such a banquet of color, such an intoxication of the senses, that save in the garden the pinch of approaching winter is constantly forgotten. Not so now, when many trees—the chestnuts and maples, for instance—are as leafless as so much dead timber. Only the oaks and elms are left to respond to a sun-burst, the oaks with very pale copper, the elms with palest gold. This, and not October, is the autumn of Lamartine's famous stanza:—

> "Oui, dans ces jours d'automne où la nature expire,
> A ses regards voilés je trouve plus d'attraits;
> C'est l'adieu d'un ami, c'est le dernier sourire
> Des levres que la mort va fermer pour jamais."

In unexposed cottage gardens a few frosted hollyhocks and chrysanthemums linger, but the dahlias are all gone. The ranker herbage of the roadside is dead also, and among its tall skeletons the well-hidden nests of last summer's whitethroats and yellow-hammers come to light. Yet in the South, in sheltered nooks and ditches, stray blossoms of red campion and red nettle still peep, and a flowering white nettle is common. Daisy-plants in the cow-pastures lie as flat and close to the earth as they would on a shaven and rolled lawn; their attitude is a plant's way of keeping warm, and it will be imitated as winter advances by nearly every wild green thing that dares remain above ground. A few dandelions and a few buttercups (of a special kind) are the only yellow flowers left.

Birds are exceptionally silent. The robin's song, so conspicuous in September and October, ends with the latter month. The thrushes interpolate a few weeks of song a little later; they begin about the beginning of December and finish before Christmas. At present we have only call-cries, and few of them. Flocks of finches feed on the stubble in silence. Flocks of starlings have little to say to each other till half-past three, when they begin manœuvring for a roosting-place. In the hedges all one hears are wrens, with their trilling pipe a little ghostly and cricket-like, especially after sundown. The unvarying caw of the rook sounds particularly friendly at this season.

Keats made a very bad (and rather characteristic) mistake when, in cataloguing the songs of autumn, he said, "Then in a wailful choir the small gnats mourn." Throughout the autumn the impressive thing about the gnats is their absolute silence, contrasted with the restless and seemingly aimless fever of their motion to and fro in the air. Rossetti's simile, of the far worlds as seen in infinity spinning "like a fretful midge," shows him to have felt what Keats missed. Strange beings, these gnats—"bloodless, fleshless, boneless," as the Greeks said—surviving till the end of November, when the bees and wasps and bumble-bees, and the big beetles and the blue-bottles, and all the full-bodied monarchs of the winged insect world have either perished or gone to hibernate. It is the same with lepidoptera: the red admirals and painted ladies, the tiger-moths and hawk-moths, are all gone; but over the dead leaves under the hedgerows a swarm of unsubstantial brown and grey moths, much like clothes-moths, flutters in ghostly fashion after sunset. A short day in the country means short labor; you cannot shoot or hunt, or plough or harrow, after half-past four. The winter months that set in now would give the countryman his chief chance of festivity and also of self-culture, if either festivities or any kind of intellectual pursuits played a real part in the life of our villages. Unfortunately, they still do not; the old winter-evening joys, which are so distinctive a part of any Northern nation's heritage, are long dead and buried, and the very memorials of them hard to find. The efforts of a sensible individual here or there to resurrect or replace them do not touch the mass. And so every November the townward impulse is felt in the villages with a fresh intensity—so felt that even the known prevalence of urban unemployment at a time like the present avails little to arrest it.

THE RT. HON. LORD AVEBURY, Caxton Hall, Westminster, S.W.

I AM permitted by the Editor of THE NATION to invite its readers to fill up the voting paper printed above and to send it not later than Tuesday next, first post, addressed to Lord Avebury, Caxton Hall, Westminster, S.W. The papers thus sent in through THE NATION and other channels will be counted as stated in the margin on Thursday evening, the 4th, in the presence of representatives of the Press, M.P.'s, and others interested in the subject.

It will be remembered that an election like the present was held under the auspices of the Proportional Representation Society two years ago, and about 12,400 papers were returned. The practicability of our proposals of voting was then proved in a remarkable manner. The spoilt voting papers were extremely few, the counting, sorting, distributing, and transfers were all executed with accuracy and despatch in little more than four hours by a small band of volunteer friends. We are confident the election now started will be an even greater success. We expect a larger number of votes; and, indeed, our modest machinery will probably be severely taxed by the extension of our work. Nothing is, however, more instructive than the experience of such an election. Processes which are difficult to follow when explained beforehand in words become simple and intelligible when transacted before our eyes. This was our experience in 1906. It was repeated in the next year when the Municipal Representation Bill, which I had the honor of introducing into the House of Lords, was read there a second time and referred to a Select Committee. The details of the Bill, the whole scheme of operation of Proportional Representation through the Single Transferable Vote was explained to the Committee; but a fortunate incident—the election whilst the Committee was still sitting of a Medical Council by the process—gave the members of the Committee an opportunity of seeing the plan at work and no doubt helped them to arrive, as they did, at a unanimous conclusion that it was practicable. Voters could be trusted to do the voting, and returning officers could be found to preside over and direct the subsequent stages of counting and distribution.

I shall not weary the readers of THE NATION with a labored proof of the ease of the voters' work. Here are twelve names of candidates of different parties and sections of party, and the voter is asked to look through the names and determine which of them he would soonest have as his member, and then put the figure 1 opposite the name of this chosen person. This is all he need do; but he is recommended to go further and put the figure 2 against the man of his second choice, 3 against the third, and so on as far as he cares to discriminate between the candidates. This is done so that if his vote is not wanted or cannot be used by the man of his first choice, it may, in accordance with his expressed wish, be passed on to his second choice, or, if necessary, to a further choice, and so saved from being wasted. Now is this a difficult task? In an actual election the Parliamentary voter will have plenty of advice and instruction beforehand as to the marking of his paper; but they would be generally wholly unnecessary, and he would be entirely independent of them. But why argue abstractedly as to the difficulties of the voter? If the experience of our illustrative elections do not prove them to be imaginary, we may refer to the elections of Tasmania conducted on precisely the same plan with complete success. Still more striking is the testimony of Continental experience. The methods of elections preferred in Switzerland, in Belgium, Wurtemburg and Finland are much more complex than that we propose; yet they are worked with perfect ease and accuracy, and it can scarcely be said that the peasants, artisans, and laborers of all these countries are of higher political intelligence than the voters of the United Kingdom.

Objectors may say that the difficulty is not in the voting, but in the counting and distributing. Something is gained if we advance so far as this, and I think when a fortnight hence I may be privileged to print in THE NATION an analysis and explanation of the several steps of sorting, counting and distributing, it will be seen that this work under Proportional Representation is no more difficult for the Returning Officer of the usual standard than the work of voting is for the voter. Meanwhile I may refer as in the case of voting to what has already happened here and on the Continent as proving that there are no difficulties in the work of the Returning Officer which cannot be got over. I will add my conviction that this work can be explained to any man of ordinary intelligence who desires to understand it, so as to convince him that it is at once well ordered and just. The final questions whether it is worth while to get a representation in the great Council of the Nation of all strains of opinion entertained by an adequate number of citizens; whether it is worth while to bring into direct and vital connection with the governing Assembly of the Nation all diversities of voters, thus quickening the political life that now too often slumbers through half our communities; whether, in a word, representation should be real, and Democracy an expression for the living union and co-working of all classes—these are questions over which the student of the history and movement of Liberalism may be invited to muse.

COURTNEY OF PENWITH.

Present-Day Problems.

THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE SMALL HOLDINGS ACT.

OF those who are interested in the small holdings movement and have watched for eleven months the administration of the Act, there is probably no one but Lord Carrington himself who is really satisfied with the progress that has been made. It is now more than a year since the Act was passed, the fruit of long agitation, the centre of great hopes, the first and not the least important step in the Government's policy of land reform.

The welcome which the Act received is now well known. Even to the most ardent supporters it came at first as something of a surprise. Men who had waited for more than thirty years for a measure of this kind, who remembered the promise and then the fiasco of the Act of '92, believed that at last their hopes were to be fulfilled. In every country village eager audiences, without distinction of politics, would crowd to hear the provisions of the new Act explained. Within a few months of its coming into operation more than 23,000 applications had been made to the county councils; and of these more than half, after a searching and sometimes harsh investigation, were passed and approved as suitable. To anyone who knows our rural population, with its extreme caution, its reluctance to come forward, its apprehension of dangers both real and imaginary, these figures alone are remarkable enough, and they represent but a part of the whole demand. For every man approved by the Councils as suitable, there were probably two others, no less suitable, waiting to see how the first applicants fared. Here, indeed, was material for a Government pledged to rural reconstruction and reform. But at present, beyond these preliminary investigations, little or nothing has actually been done. Of the total number of "approved" applicants, only some five per cent. have obtained any land. Of the land which is estimated by the County Councils to be required to meet the "approved" demand, only some eight per cent. has been "arranged for." For more than 11,000 applicants who have gone through the process of getting themselves approved as suitable—with all the trouble and sometimes the risk which that involves—there is still no definite hope of land, and no assurance given them in express terms by the Government that their application will eventually be met. The Act still remains a powerful instrument for reform, but one that under the present feeble administration is fast losing its credit and its force.

To throw blame on the County Councils for this state of things, as many critics seem inclined to do, is as futile as it is generally unjust. If some Councils have been indifferent, others have done excellent work. With great public spirit, at considerable labor, they have set themselves to exercise, to the best of their ability, the powers conferred on them by the Act. Even where Councils have been notoriously hostile, they are at least entitled to urge that it was not by their consent or desire that these onerous duties were laid upon them. If County Councils had been consulted, the Act would have been a different one; it is possible that there would have been no Act at all. The really important thing to know is not what this or that Council may be saying or doing, or failing to do, but what the Government, who passed the Act, are doing to administer it, and to ensure its ultimate success. That Lord Carrington is optimistic; that he has for long taken an interest in this movement; that he has divided a great part of his own land into small holdings and allotments, with excellent results to himself and his tenants, the whole country is by now well aware. Nothing but his great popularity and influence could have postponed effective criticism so long. But Lord Carrington himself would be the first to admit that even his influence and his experience do not suffice to excuse the Department over which he presides from administering vigorously and according to its obvious intention the measure which Parliament passed.

What, then, is the charge that is being made, both in the House of Commons and in the country, against the Commissioners and the Board of Agriculture? It is not merely a charge of procrastination and delay. It is that the Board, in the policy which they have adopted, are misinterpreting and defeating the whole spirit of the Act; and that the Commissioners have not even begun to carry out some of the plain duties laid upon them. For this is, in fact, a highly centralised measure; it is with the Commissioners and not with the Councils that the primary responsibility rests; and when Lord Carrington tells us, as he not infrequently does, that the Commissioners cannot take any action until the Councils have had their opportunity, and that due time must first be allowed to see what they will do, he is making an assumption for which there is no sort of foundation in the Act. On the contrary, the duties of the Commissioners are definite and immediate. It is the Commissioners who are to "ascertain the extent to which there is a demand for small holdings in the several counties," and how it is to be satisfied, conferring for this purpose not merely with the County Councils, but "with such other authorities, associations, and persons as they think best qualified to assist them." The Commissioners, having acquired their information, are to report it to the Board, stating whether in their opinion it is desirable that "a scheme" should be made, and indicating "the nature of the proposals . . . to be embodied in the scheme." The Board, if they approve, are to forward this report to the County Council, whose duty it then becomes "to prepare one or more draft schemes" on the lines laid down by the Commissioners; and if "within six months after receiving the report" the Council fails to prepare the necessary schemes, the Commissioners are themselves to prepare and, if necessary, carry out a scheme.

That is, in outline, the procedure of the Act, and so far at least as the Commissioners are concerned, there is nothing to indicate that it may be varied or postponed upon any consideration whatever.

And yet all these elaborate provisions with which most of the first five clauses are occupied, have hitherto been absolutely disregarded. It is the County Councils, and not the Commissioners who have "ascertained" the demand, so far as it has yet been ascertained; and the Commissioners have been content to accept the figures which the various Councils from time to time have sent up to them. The demand has been "ascertained" in the most various ways. Different standards have been imposed: different methods of investigation adopted. In some counties 80 per cent. of the applicants have been approved; in others, 80 per cent. have been rejected. In many cases, as the Commissioners in their report admit, "too narrow a view" has been taken; and whole classes of applicants have been quite improperly "ruled out." But, except in cases of specific complaint, the Commissioners have declined to intervene; and are unwilling even to ask for a statement of the reasons for rejection. From some of the counties, no information is yet available; while in the case of other counties, we are told, that the inquiries are not yet completed. But even in these cases the Commissioners, whose duty it is to "ascertain the extent to which there is a demand for land," have apparently taken no steps to make good the deficiency.

Having thus failed to carry out what was apparently their first duty, the rest, of course, follows by default. With no complete particulars as to the demand, it becomes practically impossible for the Commissioners to make any report to the Board as to whether a scheme is required in any particular locality, and the proposals which ought to be embodied in it; to indicate whether cottages ought to be built, or grazing rights attached. This, too, like the ascertaining of the demand, has therefore been left entirely to the Councils. In spite of delay and criticism and discontent, no single case has yet occurred in which the Commissioners have furnished to the Board, and the Board have forwarded to the County Council, such a report as is contemplated in section 3 (1) of the Act. Unless the County Councils are ready to take action, the operation of the Act in most localities may still be indefinitely delayed. The Commissioners have, in fact, become little more than a kind of outside branch of the Local Government Board, ready to consider and approve such schemes as they receive, and to stimulate from time to time by circular and advice the local authorities concerned. The very idea that they have independent duties to perform and are ultimately responsible, with the Board of Agriculture, for the success or failure of this measure, seems already to be almost forgotten. To those of us who remember the hopes with which the Act was passed, who know how warmly the idea of this Commission was welcomed, and how many of the applications were made on the faith of its existence, it is indeed a pitiable result.

It would be impossible, of course, now to make up entirely for the ground which has thus been lost. The opponents of the Act, who were silent at first, have been only too ready to take advantage of the delay, and everywhere comes the report of discouragement and doubt. The Government have missed an opportunity which will not again recur. But one or two obvious suggestions may be made to remedy the present disappointment. (1) The Government should strengthen at once the personnel of the Commission, which, with its two Commissioners and four or five inspectors, is clearly unequal, on any interpretation of the Act, to deal with the work which it has to do. (2) The Commissioners should be asked to make up at once, as they ought to have done from the first, a complete register of all approved applications, arranged according to counties and parishes, with date of application, amount of land applied for, &c., so that the Commissioners may know where schemes are most required, and the applicants may have some assurance from the Government that their applications will in time be dealt with. (3) The Commissioners should obtain the names of all rejected applicants, with the reason for rejection, and make, wherever necessary, new and independent inquiries, so as to give those who have been unfairly rejected another chance. (4) The Commissioners should at once make a report to the Board upon all localities from which there is a demand, unless a scheme has already been prepared; and the Board should forward these reports to the various Councils, so that a time limit may be set. By such simple methods as these, by communicating more with individual applicants, and by themselves taking the lead in inquiry and report, the Board and their Commissioners might become a little less popular with some of the County Councils than they are at present, but they would at least be doing something to administer the Act in the spirit in which it was passed.

PHILIP MORRELL.

The Drama.

A HARDY ANNUAL.

I HAVE considerable confidence in predicting success for "Grit," the new play at the Kingsway Theatre. It has succeeded so often before, that there seems to be no good reason why it should not succeed again. The first-night audience, at any rate, was faithful to a favorite old theme, and applauded without stint. If other audiences fail to "play up," managers may indeed wonder what the world is coming to.

For my own part, I have never felt any enthusiasm for the theme. In the good old "Lady of Lyons" it was decked in trappings of romantic absurdity, which somehow harmonised with it. One could hear in it a far-off echo of Revolutionary rodomontade. The social aspect of the matter was emphasised, and the satire on middle-class snobbery was crudely effective. The personal aspect, on the other hand—the unfulfilment of the nominal marriage—was lightly and discreetly handled, according to early-Victorian convention. In later years, "The Ironmaster," by M. Georges Ohnet, has been inexhaustibly popular with a certain class of audiences, both in France and England; and it is this play which Mr. Herman Chilton's effort most closely resembles. In America the theme has been touched with local color by Mr. William Vaughn Moody in "The Great Divide"—again a vastly successful production. Mr. Chilton's play is, to my thinking, better than either of these, inasmuch as it is more brightly and less pretentiously handled. But it belongs to no higher order of art, and it emphasises, in a way which I find disagreeable, that aspect of the situation which early-Victorian prudery skimmed over. I am no admirer of early-Victorian prudery; but I have an uneasy suspicion that the attractiveness of this situation for latter-day audiences lies in its appeal to a sort of virtuous and respectable pruriency which is even less sympathetic.

Monsieur Ohnet's treatment of the theme was the simplest and most straightforward. His noble heroine quite frankly married her plebeian ironmaster for his money, without more ado. Pauline Deschapelles, as we all remember, was tricked into marrying Claude Melnotte, who was palmed off on her as the Prince of Como. The heroine of "The Great Divide" marries her frontier ruffian at the pistol's point, so to speak, in order to save herself from outrage at the hands of his villainous companions. Mr. Chilton has complicated the theme by means of a variation of that oldest of old devices—an eccentric will. His heroine, Erith Winter, has always looked forward to inheriting the wealth of her godfather, Sir Thomas Ransome; and her impecunious family has lived on this expectation. But when Sir Thomas dies, it is found that he has left his property in equal shares to Erith and to a Scotch carpenter who once saved his life, Jim Barr by name; and that neither of them is to have a halfpenny of the money unless they marry each other. Whether such a will is possible in law, the lawyers may decide. In any case, it is grotesquely improbable; and one does not at first see why the author should thus wantonly have departed from the chaste simplicity of M. Ohnet's version of the story. His reason becomes apparent at the close, when the discovery of another and later will leads up to a fairly ingenious and effective conclusion. The machinery, however, is of no great moment. As Jim Barr says in the play, "There's worse and there's better—a sight." The essential point to be considered is whether, granted his machinery, Mr. Chilton has given us anything true and subtle in character-study, or new and striking in dramatic effect. To both these questions, unfortunately, the answer must be in the negative—emphatically so in the former case, with more qualification in the latter.

There was a moment in the first act when I conceived hopes of something original to come. It was when the lawyer, reporting his investigations into the character of Mr. Barr, announced that he was a Socialist. There seemed to be opportunities in the idea of a working-class Socialist suddenly endowed with wealth and placed in an environment of narrow-minded and snobbish conservatism. One foresaw, indeed, the possibility of cheap and thoughtless "satire," founded on the notion that a Socialist is vowed to personal poverty, or is bound to go out and divide all his belongings with the first person that he meets in the street. There was danger of some such silliness as this; but there was also the possibility of some really thoughtful development of the situation. The hope and the fear were alike groundless. Mr.

James Barr is no more a Socialist than he is a carpenter. He is simply and solely a hero of romance; to that profession he devotes all his energies. He does not even exhibit any unusual share of that "grit" which the title promises us. There was, indeed, one passage in the second act where it almost seemed as though he might develop some character—the passage where he confessed that he had been actuated by a craving for money and for the power it confers. But how he exercises that power we are never to learn. The only thing that interests the author, and is supposed to interest the audience, is the question whether, or rather when, the "white marriage" is to become a common or variegated one. But that question does not stir in me even the most languid curiosity. I have perfect confidence that the barriers will fall about 11 p.m., at the end of the fourth act; and, in the absence of character-study, my only interest is a purely technical one, in the devices by which the author first staves off, and then brings on, the inevitable conclusion.

But if the hero is not a character, either gritty or gruelly, perhaps the heroine has more of human nature in her composition? At any rate, she is not an ideal personage—no one can say that of her. But still less is she a living woman. She has always the character required by a given situation, but never anything more. There would have been a certain interest in tracing her gradual acquisition of such insight and intelligence as should enable her to recognise the genuine human worth of her husband. But the author shows us no such gradual process. He devotes his whole second act to an unpleasant and unnecessary portrayal of the tremors and terrors of her marriage day—unnecessary, inasmuch as Mr. Barr has, in the first act, clearly announced the perfect nobility of his intentions. Then, in the third act, after six months of "white marriage," and on the very evening of her final surrender, she behaves to her husband with a silly petulance, a shrewish extravagance of unreason, which shows that time has had no ripening effect on her nature. It is not a gradual development but a sudden revulsion that the author chooses to present to us. He shows, as I have said, some ingenuity in the arrangement of his incidents; but he gives no adequate account of her change of heart between the moment when she flings the word "Plebian!" in her husband's face, and the moment, two hours later, when she falls into his arms.

I am far from wishing to depreciate the talent of Mr. Herman Chilton. He is not the least promising of the new authors whom Miss Ashwell has such a happy knack of discovering. He writes well, and in many incidents and details he shows a real sense of drama. For a first play, "Grit" is quite remarkable. Mr. Chilton evidently possesses in a high degree the intelligence of the theatre. It now remains that he should show some insight into character and some knowledge of life.

He has provided Miss Ashwell with a part which she can play to perfection, though not one which displays the highest qualities of her talent. There is no great passion in the character—the emotions through which she passes are of a chilly and negative order, fear, repulsion, and anger predominating. Miss Ashwell is capable of expressing much deeper things; but these she expresses with a quiet intensity which is quite admirable. Mr. Norman McKinnell is excellent as Jim Barr, and Mr. C. M. Hallard is good in a part of a rather stereotyped order—the lover of her own class whose mission it is to open the heroine's eyes to the defects of that class. In "The Ironmaster" he is called the Duc de Bligny, or, more commonly, the Dook de Bleeny; here his name is (as it naturally would be) Dick Travers. Mr. Denis Eadie and Miss Kate Rorke are condemned to small and very colorless parts. On the other hand, the success of the evening was scored by two little girls, Miss Mercia Vaucelle and Miss Olivia, in two well-imagined scenes which they played delightfully.

Miss Ashwell has adopted the excellent habit of printing on her playbill a little preface to her current production. The prologue of our grandfathers was an idle convention which no one would wish to see revived; and the first-night speech is open to manifold objections. But there is no reason why a manager should remain quite inarticulate, and never explain to the public his (or her) motives and intentions. In her present address Miss Ashwell states that "Grit" is produced in pursuance of her "avowed policy of following a drama of serious interest with one of a lighter or more romantic order." Long may it be before a successor to "Grit" is required; but when it is, I hope Miss Ashwell will be true to the promise implied in her statement of policy.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—There never was a riddle without an author, and it is by a method analogous to riddles that the inquiry into the survival of death is being worked. F. W. H. Myers, with the assistance of Richard Hodgson and "George Pelham," is being invited to give pieces of a puzzle, which take the form of allusions difficult to understand or connect, which are afterwards seen to proceed from some mind which has decided on the allusions, or set the riddle. These broken allusions—suggestive only as a riddle is suggestive—are made to come through Mrs. Piper, Mrs. Verrall, and Miss Verrall, and the significance of all of them is entirely unknown to, and sedulously concealed from, the mediums whose hands produce them. It will be more interesting, if the reader will follow me, to begin with the riddle rather than the solution, and to propound apparently incomprehensible matter.

On January 23rd, 1907, Mrs. Verrall, at Cambridge, wrote: "Justice holds the scales. That gives the words but an anagram would be better. Tell him that—rats, star, tars, and so on. Try this. It has been tried before. rtats. Rearrange these five letters, or again tears, stare; seam, same, and so on. Skeat, takes, Kate's, Keats, stake, steak. But the letters you should give to-night are not so many—only three, a s t."

Her next script was on January 28th, as follows: "Aster (star). Τερας (wonder or sign). The world's wonder. And all a wonder and a wild desire. The very wings of her—a winged desire. Ὑπόπτερος ἔρως (winged love). Then there is Blake and mocked my loss of liberty. But it is all the same thing—the winged desire—ἐρως ποθεινος (passion). The hope that leaves the earth for the sky—Abt Vloger. For earth too hard that found itself, or lost itself—in the sky. That is what I want. On the earth the broken sounds, threads. In the sky the perfect arc. The ∪ major of this life. But your recollection is at fault."

After this comes a diagram of a triangle inside a circle, followed by another circle, centre O, containing a triangle ABC above the centre, and the letter D on the arc below, followed by the words: "ADB is the part that unseen completes the arc."

The play on the word "star" occurs to one first, and it is done in the manner of an anagram, of which sport Richard Hodgson was a devotee, and among his manuscripts a scrap of paper, one among hundreds, has turned up on which the four-letter anagram, star, tars, rats, arts, occurs, and on the same sheet the anagram tears, stare, rates, tares, aster.

Mr. Piddington, when he read Mrs. Verrall's script, had a faint notion that he had seen the "rats" anagram among Hodgson's scraps. He sent over to Boston and got that and a number of other anagrams back which he did not remember. The "Keats" anagram is one which Mr. Myers and friends of his once made. The occurrence of the word "star" seems to have set Hodgson off on his old anagram hunting. The connection between aster and τερας is not only that of an anagram, but they have a connection in meaning, for τερας means particularly a wonder or sign in the sky, and its plural form in epic Greek means the heavenly bodies. It is thought that there may even be an etymological connection also. All this comes from the mind—or minds—of a classic and a maker of anagrams. The reader will perhaps keep the words "scales" and the words "rats" in his mind for future allusions.

* "Proc. S.P.R." Part LVII. Report by Mr. Piddington. Maclehose. 10s. net.

And now we come to the quotations from Browning. "And all a wonder and a wild desire" is the line in "The Ring and the Book" at the end of the first division of the poem, which follows the famous line, "O lyric love, half angel and half bird." The reader will kindly note the word "bird," for it follows on to speak of "wings" and "winged love" in Greek, which leads the thinker on to a quotation from Blake's poem, "The Prince of Love" — ἐρως — who mocks at the lover's loss of liberty.

And now we come to a large dose of allusions to, or loose quotations from, "Abt Vogler." The script says "The hope that leaves the earth for the sky"; the original has it, "The passion that left the ground to lose itself in the sky." There is also an echo of the line, "As the earth had done her best, in my passion to scale the sky." We have thus in this passage a plentiful dwelling upon "star" and upon Browning, with the intrusion of the word "hope," and sundry allusions to the word "bird." The diagram of the triangle in the circle was one which had been agreed upon between the Myers of Mrs. Piper and the experimenter as a sort of sign manual that he should put at the end of any cross correspondences which he attempted, so that they might be clearly identified as connected with one another. This, therefore, is a successful cross correspondence, and it caused Myers to make playfully a second diagram showing "in the sky the perfect arc." Nothing could be happier—and we will add more brainy or more characteristics of Myers—than this little touch in Mrs. Verrall's script.

But the reader wants the key to the riddle, which I am, however, not yet ready to give him. We now turn to Miss Verrall, who in entire ignorance of all that the reader knows, wrote on February 3rd a script, part of which I give: "A green jerkin and hose and doublet where the song birds pipe their tunes in the early morning. Therapeutikos ek exotikon (a healer from aliens). The crescent moon, remember that, and the star. Bird." There were then added pictures of a crescent moon, and of a star, and of a bird.

A few days later Miss Verrall was told in general terms by her mother something of what she herself had written, but in imaginary words for the original ones, and in no detail, except that there had been a five-letter anagram in it. Miss Verrall wrote on the 17th of February, when away from home, some more script, which included a diagram of a star, and proceeded: "That was the sign, she will understand when she sees it. Diapason δια πασων ρυθμος (rhythm through all). No arts avail. The heavenly harmony ως εφη οπλατων (as Plato says) (sic). The mystic three (?) And a star above it all. Rats everywhere in Hamelin town. Now do you understand?"

Here we have once more references to star, to rats, and to Browning's "Pied Piper of Hamelin," by a reference to which with great ingenuity Browning is connected with the four letters which make either star or rats. The words "Now do you understand?" after the plain allusion to the "Pied Piper of Hamelin" seem to imply that she might have understood it before, from the passage beginning "a green jerkin and hose and doublet" in her script of February 3rd, where the piper is described by his dress, by his piping, and as a healer from foreign parts. We also have "bird," again, and I suggest an allusion to "hope" in the "mystic three" of Faith, Hope, and Charity. Mr. Piddington, however, is not responsible for this. We also have the word "arts" again, and perhaps the reader will try to keep in mind the words "rhythm through all." The rhythm which comes through all probably refers for one thing to the concordance observable when all three mediums combine. The word "all" is feminine in the Greek, and the three mediums were all women. We have here, at any rate, voluminous reference to "star" and Browning, and possibly an allusion to 'hope.' We have also once more play with the four-letter anagram of Dr. Hodgson's. The crescent moon may also suggest hope. (Here again I venture beyond even the ingenuity of Mr. Piddington.)

We now reach the final clinching of the puzzle. On February 11th, through an entirely different medium, Mrs. Piper, at a sitting held at the Society's rooms in London, Myers gave the following: "Did Mrs. Verrall receive the word Evangelical? I referred also to Browning again. I referred to 'hope' and Browning. I also said 'Star.' Meanwhile look out for 'Hope,' 'Star,' and Browning."

It will not be cause for surprise that Mr. Piddington eagerly looked for these ideas through the scripts which had been given to Mrs. and Miss Verrall, whose key was now before him. The cross correspondence was proved.

Another puzzle, which ultimately only confirms the ingenuity of it all, is to be found in the word "Evangelical." On the 6th of March "George Pelham," who was co-operating with Myers and Hodgson, explains through Mrs. Piper to Mr. Piddington that Myers tried to give the name "Evelyn Hope" to Mrs. Verrall. He continues: "It was very stupid of Rector I must say [to write Evangelical for Evelyn], as both Hodgson and Myers kept repeating it over and over again to him." Rector is the amanuensis who works Mrs. Piper's hand, and through whom the messages from Myers often have to come. Rector performed the same office for the Rev. W. Stainton Moses many years ago. Here we have another ingenious double allusion to Browning and Hope, meeting in Browning's poem "Evelyn Hope."

Where, now, did the whole thing come from? Why should Hope, Star, and Browning form the materials of cross correspondence at all? The fact is that in the previous December a Latin message had been sent to Myers through Mrs. Piper to the following effect: "We are aware of the scheme of cross-correspondences which you are transmitting through various mediums; and we hope that you will go on with them. Try also to give to A and B two different messages, between which no connection is discernible. Then as soon as possible give to C a third message which will reveal the hidden connection."

This was translated by Dr. Verrall into somewhat difficult classical Latin as follows: "Diversis internuntiis quod invicem inter se respondentia jamdudum committis, id nec fallit nos consilium, et vehementer probamus. Unum accesserit gratissimum nobis, si, cum duobus quibusdam ea tradideris, inter quae nullus appareat nexus, postea quam primum rem per tertium aliquem ita perficias, ut latens illud in prioribus explicetur." The Latin was with the greatest labor and difficulty transmitted letter by letter, and syllable by syllable, through Mrs. Piper's hand to Rector. Neither Mrs. Piper nor Rector know any Latin, but it was hoped that Myers would be able, if he still retained his classical knowledge, to understand the passage and act upon it. It contained a request to work a complex and intricate correspondence through three mediums, and to make beautiful sense out of the three. Myers replied that he understood and would act upon it. The sequel shows that there came to his recollection that strong stanza in "Abt Vogler," where three meaningless sounds are said to be made into a star. As Mr. Piddington remarks, there could hardly have been found in the whole of English literature a passage more exactly describing the process by which the union of three meaningless utterances made a meaning. The stanza is as follows:—

> "But here is the finger of God, a flash of the will that can, > Existent behind all laws, that made them and, lo, they are!
> And I know not if, save in this, such gift be allowed to man,
> That out of three sounds he frame, not a fourth sound, but a star.
> Consider it well: each tone of our scale in itself is nought;
> It is everywhere in the world—loud, soft, and all is said:
> Give it to me to use! I mix it with two in my thought:
> And there! Ye have heard and seen: consider and bow the head!"

This poem, again, is full of hope, and set Myers off on Browning and Star; Browning led on to "Evelyn Hope" and "My Star," and the key to the riddle is before us. A more direct, elaborate, and appropriate answer to the Latin message could not have been found.

To add a few details: The word "scale" appears again in Mrs. Verrall's "Justice holds the scales." 'τερας' which we have had before, is described in Liddell and Scott as "any appearance or event in which men believe they could see the finger of God." Another perhaps too ingenious thought is that the δια πασων ρυθμος (the rhythm through all) may echo "Each tone of our scale is everywhere in the world."

To make the story of evidence complete, Myers directly stated later through Mrs. Piper that he had selected the Hope, Star, and Browning allusion as an intentional response to the Latin message, an example of what it asked for; and that he had made the allusion to "bird" with the same object. The connection of "bird" with Browning is suggested by Mr. Piddington as leading on naturally from the allusion "O lyric love, half angel and half bird," which precedes the line "and all a wonder and a wild desire." It might also, however, have been suggested from the poem "My Star," which contains the words, "Then it stops like a bird." It is quite in keeping with the wandering, dreamy character of these utterances that the communicating mind should thus glide from thought to thought. Myers explains also that he had taken great pains. "I never tried with greater patience than I did over those three words." A confirmation from George Pelham tells that he had also intended to bring in "Andrea del Sarto" among the Browning poems. George Pelham also said that he wished to bring in Browning's "My Star." Later also came large allusions to "Rabbi Ben Ezra," with its "figured flame which blends transcends them all" (again a most appropriate idea); to "Saul" (where the words "as star follows star" occurs); and to "La Saisiaz." These were all by-play.

But the persistent questioning of Mr. Piddington and Mrs. Sidgwick drew from Myers the fullest statements in corroboration of the sequence of thought indicated above, viz., that the Latin message had suggested the line from "Abt Vogler," "Out of three sounds he framed not a fourth sound but a star," and that that had caused him to make "Abt Vogler" the centre and source of all this Browning, Hope, Star complexity. The poem is famous already, but it will henceforth be memorable as the means by which more clearly than by any other gate tracks were made between the Present and the Hereafter.

The ingenuity of Mr. Piddington in all this research is wonderful and delightful, and the pains he has taken are beyond praise. A letter appeared in your pages in response to my former article, which preached caution, and warned against credulity on the part of the researchers. Most of the warnings had already been urged by me, and they are so abundantly, even excessively, allowed for already, that the letter seemed to me a very large consignment of coals to a well-known Tyneside region. The one detailed suggestion for a telepathic explanation, which I need not now elaborate, had already been met by Miss Johnson.

In the brief summary of over a hundred pages here given, I have not analysed everything, I have not been able to mention all the careful precautions taken against error, and I have spoken of Myers freely as though he were what he purports to be. If anyone still thinks that the source of these messages is Mrs. Piper herself, or Mrs. Verrall herself, I shall be interested in hearing his ground for such a belief. We appear to be watching uncertain human mechanism conveying messages that come from a mind which works all three mechanisms, and if so could hardly fail to be the mind of Myers aided by the mind of Hodgson. Personally, I sympathise with this most characteristic statement delivered through Mrs. Piper: "Now I believe that since you sent this [Latin] message to me I have sufficiently replied to your various questions to convince the ordinary scientific mind that I am at least a fragment of the once incarnate individual whom you called Myers. Is it not so?"—Yours, &c.,

THE EPITAPH OF THE LICENSING BILL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—When these words see the light, the House of Lords will have registered the decree issued from Lansdowne House to-day, and will have consigned to its doom the greatest temperance measure ever presented to it. I do not wish to underestimate the seriousness of the blow which that decision deals to the cause of social reform. The taxation of licences, which is now forced upon the Government as its next task, will yield back to the State something of its just rights. It may also, if dealt with carefully and thoroughly, accelerate somewhat the process of reduction of licences going on under the Balfour Act. But the problem of licensing can never be solved on merely economic lines, and the recent history of the United States is eloquent in its teaching that the taxation of licences does not diminish the consumption of liquor. The loss of the Bill is a grave set-back to the progressive forces of the nation. It means that for many years no large and comprehensive scheme of temperance reform will be laid before Parliament by any Administration. The evils which the Bill sought to remedy will have to be dealt with in detail and by instalments. The administrative reforms which it would have given, greater, in my opinion, in their cumulative effect than the mere reduction of licences, will have to be obtained by a series of less ambitious measures. To pass them will take time, and it is unlikely that in this Parliament an opportunity for bringing them forward will present itself.

And yet I would urge upon temperance reformers to be of good courage. The time given to the elaboration of this Bill, to its passage through the House of Commons, and to its advocacy in the constituencies has not been wasted. If the taxation of licences has advanced from a mere theory to a practical measure, it is because the country has been brought to understand, by the discussion of the Bill, what not one man in a hundred understood a year ago—that the huge values of licences are the creation of the State, and not of the individuals who hold them. The Bill has brought unity into the hitherto disunited ranks of the temperance army. The fight has not been lost through any spirit of faction or division among them. All the forces of progress have rallied to the support of the Bill. What previous temperance measure united in support of it the great majority of the Bishops and the United Kingdom Alliance? The fruits of their co-operation are already seen in the better feeling between Churchmen and Nonconformists, which has made an educational concordat possible. The country has been educated. The interest which the discussion of the Bill has evoked will not pass away. Men's eyes have been opened to the dangers with which the insolent tyranny of the Beer Lords threaten the very foundations of the commonwealth.

Mistakes in tactics have undoubtedly been made. Too little attention has been paid to the warning of Mr. Lloyd George, given two years ago, that the English people will not stand Prohibition, or anything that looks like Prohibition. These mistakes, to which THE NATION has rightly from time to time drawn attention, will serve as a warning to those who have to deal with the question again. But the present is not the time to enlarge upon them. It is because of its excellence, and not because of its minor defects, that the Lords have thrown out the Bill.

The feeling which is uppermost to-night in the minds of all its supporters is one of gratitude to the Prime Minister for the courage and ability with which he has carried it through the House of Commons, and to the party behind him which, with a few insignificant exceptions, has given him loyal and constant support. There is no page in the long records of his historic party which the Liberal of the next generation will read with a deeper or a juster pride than that which will tell how his fathers flung at the forces of Mammon, entrenched in their secular citadel, this brave and unfaltering challenge in the cause of men.—Yours, &c.,

"PERSONAL SERVICE AMONG THE LONDON POOR."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Miss Davies, in writing a letter hostile to the appeal for "Personal Service," has evidently misunderstood the movement. In paragraph 4 of her letter she states that the only way of helping and understanding "workers" is by means of certain organised methods adopted by the Co-operative Union or Socialist movements. Our Committee desire to assist and not in any way to disparage existing organisations, but believe that there are more ways than one of giving successful help. Surely "personal service" is a "human effort" which will not only ensure a modification of existing distress and suffering, but must lead to the thoughtful consideration of the many sad problems which confront the nation. It is exactly that "hard work in searching out causes" which personal service is certain to achieve. Our Committee are, therefore, aiming at the end desired by Miss Davies. In arguing that equality is a condition precedent to beneficial intercourse between human beings, Miss Davies makes an unproved assertion, the discussion of which would transcend the limits of a letter. Miss Davies speaks of the rich and well-to-do as "outcasts, and cut off from natural and human relationships with the mass of mankind." The Committee does not presume to brand any group of people in this way; it desires, on the contrary, to bring into close touch with each other many hitherto divided by those distinctions which Miss Davies hopes some day to see abolished.—Yours, &c.,

EDITH LYTTELTON.
VIOLET R. MARKHAM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Miss Llewellyn Davies can hardly have read, or, if she has read, has not understood, the terms of the appeal for personal service alluded to in your paragraph last week. In the last clause of her letter, Miss Davies suggests that the rich should organise themselves "to press for the development of Distress Committees, so that the resources and methods of these Committees might be more effective in relieving temporary distress until the problem of unemployment is scientifically dealt with." These words might easily have formed a sentence in the letter of appeal.

Does Miss Davies not know that the most pressing need of the Distress Committees already established is more voluntary help, that the work is sometimes ineffective just because there are not enough helpers to look after families waiting for work, or families struggling to re-establish their homes after work is procured?

The objections to personal service are stated with great bitterness, one sentence declaring that "expert supervision" is not a term of "brotherly love"—and another pointing out that "indiscriminative giving" could not be avoided. Miss Davies admits that the wicked rich might want to help, and fears unwise charity, yet "expert supervision," its only antidote, is sneered at.

It is very easy to suspect others of interested motives, and to talk of "palliatives," and "a desire to keep the people quiet." But the fact remains that the spirit which moves the Socialist to render the equality of man more practicable by legislation is the very spirit that moves others to compass the same object by different methods.

Putting aside the well-worn controversy between Socialists and individualists—who often mean the same thing while they speak a different language—it is surely a strange contention that actual contact between the rich and the poor can only engender deception and suspicion, and cannot contribute towards that knowledge and thought which, very properly, Miss Davies desires the rich should cultivate.

The true inference from her letter is that no friendly intercourse is advisable between those living in unequal social conditions. One would have thought that even in the fully-organised Socialist State there would be room—though not much room—for other than statutory kindness. But until that Millennium has been reached, do not let Miss Davies persuade us that human kindness is altogether a dangerous and uncontrollable force.—Yours, &c.,

A SUBSCRIBER TO THE NATION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I hope you will allow me the opportunity of putting forward some considerations on the other side in answer to Miss Llewelyn Davies' attack upon the new organisation formed with this object.

Miss Llewelyn Davies objects to any friendship between rich and poor, except that which may grow out of mutual association through the co-operative, trade union, or Socialist movements. Yet no one knows better than Miss Llewelyn Davies that association with the workers through these movements brings us, on the whole, into touch with a very different class from the unskilled class of workers, which is largely represented among the unemployed. The method she suggests is a very good one, but as an alternative to the personal service suggested by the League it is out of place. I have for years had much to do with co-operative associations throughout the country, but is that to debar me from getting to know some of my neighbors in Chelsea? The West London Co-operative Society is, I know, a flourishing little store, but how futile to suppose that its few hundred members bear any appreciable relation in numbers to the unemployed of this district! It is a commonplace in the co-operative movement that "the poor" are not affected by the store system. Miss Davies has herself, I understand, done something towards remedying this in Sunderland, but here in London the co-operative movement is not, to begin with, a large one, and it does not provide for the needs of the poorer class. Meantime, unemployment is prevalent, and it is surely desirable to make some special effort to deal with cases of hardship. How can we wait for these working-class movements to grow before doing anything? Far be it from me to say that it is not most desirable to work in with them, and to meet those who are concerned with those movements, but to suggest that those who wish to help should confine their attention to them appears absolutely unreasonable.

The explanation no doubt lies in a somewhat irreconcileable "Socialism." Miss Davies appears to fear the growth of a better understanding between classes. But this result which she fears would surely be hailed by many of us as a long step in the right direction. One of the criticisms she quotes expresses, in my view, a very real truth. "My view of personal service as from the wealthy to the poor is to educate them to a sense of their responsibility as citizens"—but is this to exclude that recognition of a common citizenship, a common humanity, which prompts the organisers of this movement to desire that cases of special distress should be known to them and helped in the meantime?

I would suggest that the more intimate knowledge which would result from this modification of the "Elberfeld system" would tend to prevent the charity of the rich leading to deception and misunderstanding, as it is stated always to do.

The method suggested would not interfere with other schemes; it would not prevent "the formation of distress committees"; it is supplementary to other methods of dealing with the situation. "Robust thought, a burning sense of the wrongs and injustices suffered," are, indeed, essential in dealing with this problem, but why they should not prompt us to such personal service as is suggested, as well as to other actions, remains a mystery.—Yours, &c.,

THE SETTLEMENT COMMITTEE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—A Committee has been formed to support the Government, the Archbishop of Canterbury, many Nonconformist leaders, and others in their efforts to secure an educational peace. The Committee is endeavoring to focus the large mass of opinion both among Churchmen and Nonconformists favorable to a settlement of the religious controversy which is harassing the country, impeding administration, and injuring the efficiency of the schools.

The Committee includes men and women of all political parties and of the various religious bodies. It will work on a non-party basis. The members do not necessarily regard the proposals for settlement as in every way a satisfactory solution of the problem; but, rather than prolong a controversy hurtful to the religious life and educational interests of the nation, are prepared to acquiesce in general support of the proposals of the Government. They realise that to secure a friendly settlement all parties concerned must make great sacrifices for the common good. Those who have joined the Committee signify thereby their willingness to assent to the general lines of settlement proposed by the Government Bill, but must not be held to have committed themselves to an approval of all its details, or to an acceptance of the financial proposals of the Bill in their present form.

The representative character of the Committee is shown by the fact that it has been joined by the following, among many hundred others: The Bishops of London, Winchester, Hereford, St. Albans, Southwark, Wakefield, Gloucester, Ely, Stepney, Croydon, Dover, Sheffield, and Knaresborough; the Dean of Westminster; Drs. Alexander Maclaren, Fairbairn, Clifford, Guinness Rogers, Horton, Skinner, Forsyth, Wardlaw Thompson, Charles Brown; Professors Hope Moulton and A. S. Peake; Revs. J. H. Shakespeare, Silvester Horne, J. H. Sir Edward Clarke, Sir John Kennaway, M.P., Sir Arthur Charles, Mr. Henry Hobhouse, Sir Lewis Dibdin, Sir Thomas Barlow, Sir C. Thomas Dyke Acland; Sir Dyce Duckworth; the Common Serjeant, the Headmasters of Eton, Harrow, Charterhouse, and Westminster; the Deans of Windsor, Durham, Peterborough, and Wells; the Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge University (Dr. Mason), the Master of Trinity; Professors Sanday, Stanton, Inge, Clifford Allbutt; Canons Body, Barnett, Bickersteth Ottley, Benham, and J. MOOT POINTS IN THE PENSIONS ACT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The members of Pension Committees and Sub-Committees and others interested in the good working of the Pensions Act should be thankful to your correspondent, Mr. E. R. Pease, for so ably putting together disputed and doubtful points in administration. There is one point to which, as a member of one of the above Committees, I should wish to call immediate attention. One cannot help being struck with the inequality and also injustice of cases in which the claimants are wives whose claim is being set aside because their husbands have been in receipt of poor relief. There are cases in which a woman (seventy-one years), with £478 in savings bank and Consols, has been awarded a pension, while another woman (seventy-three years), with a semi-starvation pittance, has been refused, because her husband, quite broken down, is in receipt of the inadequate out-relief of 2s. 6d. per week. Such cases might be multiplied: an applicant, for example, with £900 in Consols gets a pension; aged women, as in case stated, with scarcely income at all, are shut out. Then there are the cases in which the man receives 3s. 6d. or 4s. a week for the support of himself and wife. How are these to be dealt with? Generally speaking, the wife has been advised that it is no use claiming, and, consequently, is losing the possibility of receiving a pension on New Year's Day. There appears to be no longer any doubt in both these instances, since Pension Officers are in receipt of a letter from Somerset House stating that "the receipt of poor relief by the husband does not debar a wife from receiving a pension, nor is the wife disqualified if the relief received by her husband is for the support of both himself and his wife; but, on the other hand, the receipt of poor relief by a wife disqualifies the husband." This instruction, or ruling, has, for example, been put into operation already in this part of the country by the Strasted and District Pensions Committee, and also by that of Lutterworth, and at the same time Boards of Guardians are taking action. In the Saffron Walden Union it is stated that there are 262 persons of seventy years of age and over who are in receipt of out-relief, and that fifty of these are wives who are eligible for a pension. It is calculated that this will save the Board £5 a week, and it is proposed to expend the amount saved on increasing the scale of relief to the about 200 cases that will not benefit by the pension. The Newmarket and other Boards of Guardians here and there are also taking action on the same lines. Enough has been stated to show how desirable it is that your readers who are in a position to do so should, wherever necessary, bestir themselves in this matter of dire importance, and so, if possible, make some of that element of happiness which will be wished on that eventful New Year's Day to which many are already counting the days.

A line on one other point. After some consideration, I have come to the conclusion that it is the right thing to do to publish lists of those who have obtained pensions. "The names of the big pensioners are published all the world over," say the forthcoming beneficiaries under the new Pensions Act; "we ought to have our place as well." The Prime Minister has been careful to make it clear that the receipt of an old age pension is to be regarded as a mark of citizenship, carrying with it national recognition. In this way we shall do something to stamp out the notion of pensions being an extended system of parish pay, which the Opposition are still busy sowing broadcast.

It will be well, also, to bear in mind that it is not safe for Pension Committees and Sub-Committees always to follow the lead given by the legal pension handbooks which have been issued. The compilers have not always the strength of mind to say they do not know; their rulings are sometimes a little previous and beside the mark, as, for example, in points connected with the Poor Law and Pensions, which are only just being worked out. Besides this, certain instructions and decisions have been settled and arrived at since date of publication.—Yours, &c.,

SUFFRAGISTS AND SUFFRAGETTES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Letters such as Mr. Nevinson's are likely rather to retard than promote their writers' ends. They smack of hysteria. Had men been guilty of the same deliberately provocative conduct as these women militants, they would have been far more roughly treated and more heavily punished by the courts. Besides bringing into contempt the practice of legitimate heckling, they insolently declare that no M.P. to whom they politically object shall address his constituents, &c.! What next?

Inviting disturbance and ill-treatment, making a great parade of free martyrdom, no sooner are they in prison than all sorts of claims are made by or for them, that it is not to be any real punishment! Their political enfranchisement depends on men, in the last resort. And they, with their unwise advocates, are doing their best to disgust men, both with their methods and their claims. It is "utmost cowardice," we are told, which stops these women from "rushing" the Commons with a mob, and breaking up public meetings!—Yours, &c.,

WOMEN'S WAGES IN FINLAND.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your last issue of THE NATION Mr. H. W. Nevinson states "that the very first law passed in Finland after women obtained the franchise equalised the wages of men and women." I have a correspondent residing at Helsingfors who writes, under date of November 17th, as follows:—

"On Sunday I was at a very representative gathering. There is a Woman's Union, with branches all over Finland, which send delegates for a three days' feast of lectures and assemblies at Helsingfors. It was very like the annual gathering at the National Union of Women Workers. Well, Vera Hyelt talked to them, and Maikki Friberg and others who are working for equality of payment for men and women. Just the simple, obvious case that if a man and woman do the same work, they ought to receive the same pay. The matter is a little clearer here, since the man is most often not expected to "keep" his wife. In the brain-worker classes she generally works too, double work, of course, if she is the mother of a family; they don't yet quite recognise that as a profession."

If the law has passed, as Mr. Nevinson states, it would seem clear, from the above, that it is at present ineffective. —Yours, &c.,

THE GOVERNMENT AND INTERNATIONAL PEACE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—After a year which, in spite of occasional alarms, has been distinguished by many successful efforts to improve international relations and cement the peace of the world, we appear to be ending with an anti-climax. The series of international visits; the Franco-British Exhibition; the great London Peace Congress, welcomed by King, Premier, and Government; the Inter-Parliamentary Conference in Berlin; the solution of the Casablanca difficulty; the peaceful revolution in Turkey; the prevention of an outbreak in the Balkans; the settlement of outstanding questions with Russia; and the substantial step of the German people towards Parliamentary control of an irresponsible rule—these various incidents afforded solid ground for the hope that a better era of international relations was approaching, and that peaceful influences were beginning to make themselves felt in the councils of nations. In all these incidents our country has played a not unworthy part.

Yet it is this moment that the Premier and Government have chosen for a recantation of pacifist principles, and a reopening of the international competition in armaments which, it had been hoped, might be stayed.

Instead of offering to deal with Germany on the basis of an agreement to exempt neutral commerce from capture at sea, they accept the out-and-out Jingo policy of a mechanical "two-Power standard" (plus 10 per cent.). King, Ministers, and people have been toiling to establish "ententes," understandings, and alliances, and at the end of it all we are told, in effect, that none of these things matter substantially, that policy has nothing to do with armaments, and that we must continue to arm on a simple mathematical basis of 10 per cent. more than the two most powerful navies of the world. Not that this makes any difference to the Jingo clamor to which (apparently) the Cabinet has bowed. The surrender of Mr. Asquith to the Navy League is immediately followed by the appearance of the President of the National Service League (Lord Roberts) in the House of Lords, with a cool demand for an additional conscript (?) army of 1,000,000 men, to enable him to sleep more easily o' night, without fear of a German invasion.

The electoral triumph of 1905, with the promise of a League of Peace and reduction of armaments, has eventuated in this state of affairs.

I make no further comment than to say this: that if to arm against friends as well as possible rivals; if to surrender the principle that policy must govern armaments; if to darken counsel by pretending to be curing the evils of the poor and of unemployment by laying down more "Dreadnoughts" and tempting men into the Special Reserve; if these things represent latter-day Liberalism, it is time a separate Radical and Peace Party is created, both in Parliament and in the constituencies, of men who place principle before party convenience, and are prepared to risk the anger of the militarist Press rather than to engage afresh in the ruinous race for an armed predominance which is leading us straight towards the disaster which it is imagined is being averted.

Apologising for the length of this letter, which the supreme importance of the subject may, perhaps, excuse, I am—Yours, &c.,

H. S. PERRIS,
Secretary, National Peace Council.

GRAMMATICAL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I was long ago taught to write "the white and the colored races," but "the Ptolemaic and the Copernican theory" (with the alternative form, "the Ptolemaic and Copernican theories"); and, with all due respect, I am still disposed to follow the leadership of Leslie Stephen, and to flatter myself that I have my good reasons. How ticklish a matter it is to adjust the singular and plural forms when a second the or a preposition intervenes is amusingly illustrated in THE NATION of last week, on the page following that on which you tell us that the obvious correction of Stephen's sentence is "The rational and the emotional natures"; where we read: "Books on Mrs. Gaskell by Mr. Clement Shorter, on Charles Kingsley by Mr. G. K. Chesterton," &c. Mr. Chesterton's literary fecundity has prepared us for much, but hardly for his tumbling out a litter of books on a single writer.—Yours, &c.,

THE EDUCATION COMPROMISE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I play Zola, and accuse the Government? That they have introduced a Bill which makes the giving of religious instruction by all local authorities compulsory, adding 50 per cent. to the maximum time now given to such instruction, and enforcing this, not by withdrawal of grant, but by making every member who signs a cheque for salaries personally responsible for the money if insufficient time is given. That this instruction is to be superintended by H.M. Inspectors, and its adequacy decided by the Board of Education. That the Board will be compelled to decide that "religious instruction" consists of the teaching both of the Old and New Testaments as historically true, though not one in five of the Government or the Liberal majority believes that they are. That whoever drafted Mr. Trevelyan's answer on this point to Mr. Gooch last night intended to mislead him. That the facts are unknown to many who have signed the manifesto in favor of the Bill That, although this is now stated to be a vital part of the Bill, it was kept out both of the inspired communications which appeared during the last few weeks in the newspapers and of Mr. Asquith's speech last night. That the Bill was published too late for criticism last Saturday, and that the vital clause is to be closured through on Monday. That the avowed reason for this secrecy and haste is that if the provisions of the Bill become known it will not pass (a Radical M.P., who supports the Bill, writes to me this morning: "Everyone" (in the House) "realises that to postpone it," even for a few days, "is to kill it.") That such action would be impossible if the majority of the House were composed of any other human material than English gentlemen brought up in the atmosphere of English hypocrisy.—Yours, &c.,

A FRENCH VIEW OF MR. WILLIAM ARCHER.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Some years ago M. Emile Faguet devoted half-a-dozen feuilletons dramatiques in the "Journal des Débats" to a study of Mr. William Archer as a dramatic critic, and he wound up the series of articles with the declaration that, in his opinion, Mr. Archer "est le plus grand critique dramatique qui ait paru depuis Lessing."

THE NATION is to be congratulated on having gained what the "World" lost when it lost Mr. Archer, who has "found himself again" in going back to weekly criticism, at which one, at any rate, of his old readers in the "World" is delighted.—Yours, &c.,

WANTED—A REFERENDUM!

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is announced in to-night's papers that, at a "private" meeting, the "Unionist Peers," in number about 300, have "decided to throw out the Licensing Bill."

Parenthetically one wonders: will the Government once more "take it lying down," or will they not rather instantly, and without debate, return the Bill en bloc to the Upper House.

In any case the episode only emphasises the need of a Referendum similar to that at present in operation in Switzerland, which country has just decided a similar question by the vote of the people themselves.

The first question to be submitted to such a tribunal might be that of the Licensing Bill itself, the second most decidedly should be. "Are the wishes of the great majority of the nation, as voiced by their authorised representatives, to be subject to the whims of a permanent Tory caucus, elected by nobody, and representing only their own interests?"

If so, better, by far, have an Imperial despotism at once. It is certainly strange that, at a time when Russia, Turkey and Persia, three of the most reactionary peoples in the world, are struggling to obtain expression for the popular will, while even in bureaucratic Germany men are daring to criticise the Kaiser, and India, China and Japan are awakening to freedom, we in England should be willing to bend the neck to the plutocracy.

What will the Government do? I, for one, venture to prophesy—nothing.—Yours, &c.,

THE INDIAN IRRECONCILABLES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I hoped to see in your last issue an adequate reply to the letter which you published a week earlier on "The Conciliation of the Irreconcilables." I suppose that letter is to be taken seriously, as it had the honor of a place in your columns; and, if so, there should be equally serious consideration how the position of the Indian Nationalists is to be treated. For many years I have known a good deal of what has been done in London to welcome Indian students residing there, and I know how many would be sorry if all their kindly efforts were proved to be futile, and how their whole attitude would be changed if they were convinced that "the insidious alliance between the bomb and young India" can be broken up only by a policy which contemplates the complete political severance of India from the Empire. This practice of saying "Give us what we want, not because we have proved that we ought to have it, but because we can make ourselves such a nuisance that you will ultimately be forced to yield," has been tried in Ireland, and is now in favor with the suffragettes, and it may well be that Indian rivers will be reddened with bloodshed if it prevails along their banks. Certainly, it is difficult to imagine England giving way to threats of bomb-throwing until much blood has been shed. But is it now necessary to look as far ahead as the writer desires? It will probably be admitted by all that if British rule in India were at once withdrawn, it would be succeeded, in the first instance, by the rule of the warrior, not of the clerk, by that of the best fighters, not of those who can best pass examinations. This of itself might redden the rivers considerably. It is surely not less evident that the eager desire of European nations to extend the territory over which they bear sway would next lead to the speedy conquest of India, say, by Germany. How aspirations after Nationalism would then be treated is a subject which may be studied in various parts of the world.

If no one desires either of these consummations, what is there wrong in the policy we are now pursuing, gradually extending self-government and local liberties, but punishing crime as crime, and refusing to regard bomb-throwing as honorable warfare?

There is no grander problem for our future than to decide the various forms of Home Rule suited to the different parts of our Empire, and so far the main obstacle to progress seems the impatience of those who are not content to advance their cause by the legitimate appeal to reason and conscience, but who try to work upon our fears, or to worry us into acquiescence with what we do not think right by outrageous importunity.—Yours, &c.,

WHAT IS LOVE?

MEIN Herz ich will dich fragen
Was ist die Liebe? Sag'
Zwei Seelen und ein Gedanke
Zwei Herzen und ein Schlag.

Und sprich, woher kommt Liebe?
Sie kommt und sie ist da.
Und sprich wie schwindet Liebe?
Die war's nicht der's geschah.

Und was ist reine Liebe?
Die ihrer selbst vergisst.
Und wann ist Lieb' am tieffsten?
Wenn sie am stillsten ist.

Und wann ist Lieb' am reichsten?
Sie ist es wenn sie giebt.
Und sprich, wie redet Liebe?
Sie redet nicht, sie liebt.

F. HALM.

Translation.

COME tell me what Love is,
O, Heart, I entreat.
"Two souls and one purpose,
Two hearts and one beat."

And say whence it cometh.
"No mortal knows whence."
And where does it fly to?
"What fled was pretence."

And when is Love purest?
"When self is asleep."
And when is Love deepest?
"Most still is most deep."

And when is Love richest?
"When it gives its last crumb."
And what is Love's language?
"It loves, and is dumb."

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE view current among publishers regarding the season now drawing to a close is that, though rather above the average, it has not been as prosperous as they had anticipated. In one or two cases books have been held over, in the hope that trade will improve in the New Year. The autumn has seen a marked slackening in the demand for color books, their place being taken by autobiographies and volumes of reminiscences, most of which seem to have sold very well. From a reader's point of view, the season has produced a crowd of books open to Hazlitt's criticism that, like made-up dishes, "they are generally little else than hashes and rifaccimenti of what has been served up entire, and in a more natural state, at other times." Still, many of them are interesting and readable, though few are of such outstanding merit that they compel attention.

THAT we are still without a really good Life of Thackeray is, at least in part, due to his dislike of biographies that were mere eulogies of their subject. Once, after reading a book of this type, he struck the volume impatiently with his hand, exclaiming: "None of this nonsense about me after my death." His daughters acted on the injunction, and no official Life was written, though a number of short biographies have appeared, chiefly in series devoted to men of letters. Mr. Whibley's book in Messrs. Blackwood's "Modern English Writers" is one of the best of these, but Trollope's, in the "English Men of Letters," and the volume by Herman Merivale and Sir Frank Marzials, in the "Great Writers" series, are neither of them successful. We understand that Mr. Lewis Melville is now at work on a biography which he hopes will fill the vacant niche. Mr. Melville has already attempted the same task, but his "Life of Thackeray," published ten years ago, is now out of print, and much fresh material has come to light since its appearance.

ANOTHER literary biography to be published shortly is "Mr. Pope of Twickenham," by the lady who signs herself "George Paston." Her real name, as most people know, is Miss Emily Morse Symonds, and Mr. W. P. Courtney tells us, in his entertaining "Secrets of Our National Literature," that she took the name Paston because, as a native of Norfolk, she was interested in the famous "Paston Letters," and "George for the truly feminine reason that it was lucky." Her coming work will give special attention to Pope's friendships and enmities; and, as "George Paston" has already shown herself to be at home in the by-paths of eighteenth-century literature, we may look for an entertaining volume. It will be published by Messrs. Hutchinson.

THE fourth and last volume of M. Hanotaux's great history of "Contemporary France" has just appeared in French, and Messrs. Constable will issue the English translation within the next few weeks. The new volume covers the period from 1877 to 1890, and has special authority from the fact that M. Hanotaux was for some time French Foreign Minister. The book deals at considerable length with the Near Eastern question as it appeared during the years following the Franco-German war. In his preface the author declares that, after having written the triumphs of Bismarck, he will be glad to return to the France of the age of Richelieu. We may hope from this that M. Hanotaux has another historical work in contemplation.

WE have once or twice before pointed out that literary lectures seem to be regaining their popularity. Mr. Henry Van Dyke began a course last week at the Sorbonne on American civilisation and literature, to which the French newspapers have given a great deal of attention. M. René Bazin has promised to lecture in London early next month, and the Berlitz School of Languages has organised a series of lectures, which will be held monthly at the Grafton Galleries. Among the lecturers are M. Maurice Donnay, M. Jean Richepin, M. Adolphe Brisson, M. Funck-Brentano, and M. Edmond Haraucourt. Simultaneously in Paris there will be lectures by Mr. T. P. O'Connor, Mr. Frank Lascelles, Mr. Jerome K. Jerome, Mr. Hilaire Belloc, and others. The plan is a good one, and we hope that the Berlitz school will be well supported in carrying it through.

MR. THOMAS HARDY has written an introduction and notes to a volume of "Select Poems of William Barnes," which Mr. Henry Frowde has just published. Mr. Hardy defends Barnes's employment of dialect on the double ground that it saved him from "the disaster that has befallen so many earnest versifiers of recent times"—slavery to the passion for form, and that it was a way of escape from "those dreams and speculations that cannot leave alone the mystery of things," since it "helped him to fall back on dramatic truth by making his personages express the notions of life current in their sphere." Mr. Hardy believes that Barnes belongs "to the literary school of such poets as Tennyson, Gray, and Collins, rather than to that of the old, unpremeditating singers in dialect. . . . We do not find in the dialect balladists of the seventeenth century, or in Burns (with whom he has sometimes been measured), such careful finish, such verbal dexterities, such searching for the most cunning syllables, such satisfaction with the best phrase." Mr. Frowde has lately given us several half-forgotten books in neat and handy form, but this selection from Barnes is likely to prove the most popular in the series.

MESSRS. HODDER & STOUGHTON'S new series, "The Reader's Library," makes a good beginning with two volumes of selections from "The Great English Letter-Writers," by Mr. W. J. Dawson and his son, Mr. Coningsby Dawson. The selection is, on the whole, judicious, though we miss several favorites, Swift, for example, being represented by a single letter and Cowper by only two. The introduction to the first volume is called "The Development of English Letter-Writing," but more than half of it is given up to a discussion of letter-writing among the ancients, and the period from Chaucer to Fitz-Gerald is compressed into less than ten pages. This defect is compensated for in some degree by an essay in the second volume on "The Art and Attainment of English Letter-Writing," in which judgment is passed on the letters of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, Horace Walpole, Keats, Lamb, Carlyle, FitzGerald, Stevenson, and James Smetham. Why are Swift, Cowper, Gray, and Byron left out of account? Swift's letters, apart from their excellence of style, are admirable as revelations of character, and quite dispose of the common view that Swift was a morose cynic. For ease and simplicity Cowper's are the best in the language, and we would class them even higher than those of Lamb, which, for all their humor, are more formal and self-conscious. Gray is second only to Cowper, and the notes on art and literature scattered through his pages, together with his descriptions of nature, abound in good phrases and sound judgments Byron's letters are characteristic of their author—a little theatrical, but among the dozen best collections of letters in the language. However, it would be ungracious to find fault with Mr. W. J. and C. W. Dawson when they offer so good a selection from this delightful department of literature, though Mr. Mumby has performed a similar task with such excellent judgment that we are led to apply a high standard to all who follow him.

A NEW THEORY OF LAUGHTER.*

Art and the theory of art have not always the same lovers. Orlando may be enraptured by the face of Rosalind, and yet listen with impatience to a mere inventory of her charms. Artists—and they are supposed to have at least a feeling for aesthetic principles—frequently weary of their discussion. They leave the endless debate between realism and idealism to the second-rate, as a rule, to the more uncertain executant. But a halting artistic ability need not prevent a man more strongly endowed with intellectual qualities (as is the common case) from taking an interest in the theory of art, and deriving from it an appropriate theoretical satisfaction. Especially is this satisfaction to be expected if our theory is willing to imitate the suppleness, the gracious play of features, the intricate rhythm of art herself, to fit it like a glove, to paint it as in a picture.

Such a theory seems to have been at last supplied in the case of comedy by that brilliant leader of the new philosophy in France, M. Henri Bergson. All that has been hitherto said on the theory of laughter is already very trite. Aristotle knew that we laugh at defects which are harmless and do not cause us pain. It has been the object of later philosophers to discover what the nature of this defect was; and "the incongruous," "the absurd," "the unexpected," have been freely offered as replies to the question. But such definitions seem either to be merely verbal or inexact. "Absurdity" seems to be the very idea which calls for definition. Incongruity may not be laughable at all, and many things, the loveliest modulations and cadences, are unexpected. One theory tells us that we laugh only when we have something before us marked with degradation; that all laughter is the rustling of the wings of parody. But a flattering description of a rogue, though ironical, is still comic, and makes us laugh. The truth is that no one has made an advance upon Aristotle till the other day, and that was because it was only the other day that modern psychology was born. Let us now hear what M. Bergson has to say.

That laughter is a purely human function is no new truth, but that the object of ridicule is always humanity, or something thought of in analogy with the human, e.g., a limping dog, will perhaps not find immediate acceptance. Secondly, M. Bergson insists that the object of laughter must not stir our emotions; he thus amplifies the Aristotelian dictum which states that it must not cause pain. We must be relatively insensitive. In a world in which we were wholly free from emotion, we should no longer weep, but we might still laugh. Finally, laughter is a social function. We can laugh heartily only in company, and the function of laughter is to punish and so repress certain actions that appear as defects to the social consciousness. Now what are these? The answer is that they all have one characteristic—a certain clumsiness, a want of adaptation to the immediate demands of the moment; it is a certain raideur, a mechanical inflexibility, which signalises the ridiculous act. Thus we laugh when a man in his hurry trips and falls. If he had been sufficiently adroit, he would have avoided the obstacle. Life itself is infinitely flexible; no two occasions are exactly alike; every new moment calls for some fresh adaptation on the part of a living being. Now everything that imposes a restraint upon this flexibility, everything producing automatic repetition at a moment when something fresh was called for, everything that simplifies unnaturally is distasteful to the social sense, which metes out chastisement to the defect by laughing at it. Hence our unfortunate tendency to laugh at a limp, at deafness, and on many other occasions when only an outflow of sympathy can restrain our propensity. But an automatic character can be discerned not merely in outward actions, but in behaviour generally. All warping of conduct due to pedantry, priggishness, or excessive professionalism is ridiculous. Thus even that man of the world, the doctor, develops a "manner" which amuses those outside the profession, the layman laughs at the parson, and the school boy (surreptitiously) at his master.

We have here, then, the essence of the ridiculous. It is the automatic—that servile element in the human constitution—usurping offices of power; it is the mechanical interspersed in the fluid: ice-wrack on the living water. This mechanism can appear either in some rigidity or contraction of feature, like those peculiarities of form which caricaturists exaggerate so ruthlessly; or it may enter into our movements. Any mechanical repetition of a gesture, a phrase, or a formula gives rise to laughter; nay, even any exact imitation, mimicking of actions not in themselves ridiculous, becomes so; it suggests mechanism once more. It is in this principle that M. Bergson finds a solution for Pascal's riddle—"How is it that two similar countenances, neither of which is in itself ridiculous, become so when viewed together?"

So far, we have dealt with elementary cases. But the most brilliant part of M. Bergson's exposition consists in a working out of this simple motif into the most complicated examples of the comic in literature. But first he deals with less obvious instances of automatism. All disguise is of this nature. We are accustomed to the disguise of the clothes which we commonly wear. But any masquerading at once brings out the fact that we have imposed some constraint upon our natural movements. The savage, doubtless, laughs when first he sees one of his tribe in the habiliments of decency. Again, all insistence on the body—that part of us which is likest a thing—becomes comic when it is the spirit with which we are concerned. "Il était vertueux et tout rond" is instance enough, and your funny men have mostly too much body; your Falstaffs are all fat. It is a further development that all play which treats the human body as though it were a mere thing is comic. Witness the collisions and reboundings of circus clowns.

Now, there are certain elementary forms of children's play that seem to depend upon the mechanical manipulation of things that have a superficial resemblance to a living being, for example, that of the jumping-jack or that of the dancing doll. M. Bergson holds that the principle of these sports may be detected in a subtle form in many comic situations in literature. His own illustrations are taken mostly from French comedy. A conspicuous example of the "jumping-jack" motif can be seen in the reiterated "et Tartuffe?" with which Orgon interrupts Dorine's account of Elmire's illness. No matter how often the question is repressed, it thrusts itself forward again as if propelled by a spring. A somewhat similar piece of play is found in the dialogue between the clown and poor Malvolio immured in darkness, and the automatism is obvious in Slender's "O sweet Anne Page!" As to the "dancing doll" theme, it forms the scheme not merely of many scenes and long intrigues (as in the case of Scapin's rascality), but of whole plays. In comedy it is no fault if the personages are puppets manipulated by Fortune or their own frailties. From our contemporary stage, we can cite "The Admirable Crichton" and "Man and Superman" as delightful realisations of this principle. Another schema of comic situation is that of the mechanical transference of action from point to point in a series, as when the fall of one tin soldier ends by upsetting the whole row. This may be a situation of the merest farce, as when A. jostles B., who sends C. flying, who in turn by his impact knocks D. through the window. Or we may have the same thing more delicately handled, and perhaps the action proceeding in a circle, in which case we have the situation of the "voleur volé," such as forms the whole plot of "Georges Dandin" or "The Merry Wives."

Conditions fundamentally identical govern the comedy which lies not in the situation, but in the words used. We laugh when a form of expression controls our thought automatically in an inappropriate context; we smile at the sluggard's maxim about "not working between meals." The literal construction of a metaphor gives us the same result. Thus, of a pretentious person, it was remarked, "il court après l'esprit," and the comment of Boufflers was, "je parie pour l'esprit!"

It would be entertaining to follow our author through all the devious ways through which he tracks "distraction"

* "Le Rire." Par Henri Bergson. Paris: Alcan. 5me. édition.

—a mechanical functioning, and hence an alienation from the truly living, in language. But more important still is his account of the comic element in character. In such types as Don Quixote, or, say, Mr. Dick, we may instantly recognise examples of his main principle. The "fixed idea" leading to the mechanical reiteration of a particular way of acting or viewing the world becomes highly ridiculous. Whatever is stereotyped in our mental dispositions readily brings down a laugh on itself. The professional element is an easy prey; think only of Molière's (or Bernard Shaw's) doctors. Or, now, it is something still more universal that is rallied; the "eternal feminine" is satirised in "Epicure me plaît," "J'aime les tourbillons." Note also that this laughable automatism is always something of which the person manifesting it is unconscious. The dear old professors, with their quaint ways, never know of their own mannerisms. It is a sad fact, too, that practically everything of the nature of character, when once it becomes so much our possession as to be an automatism, tends to be comic. Does not the well-known use of the term when we talk of "a character" confirm this? And even resemblance to a type not in itself comic readily provokes a smile. A man runs some risks if he acts so as to earn the title of "a Romeo" or "a Hamlet." The great fountain of the ridiculous element in character is, psychologically, that irrepressible human failing—vanity." With its quality of unconsciousness, its overmastering power of ruling our conduct and making us its puppets, it continually creates fresh comic situations. And laughter is the chastisement which Society prescribes for it. Its faults are offences, not so much against the moral as against the social ideal. But the laugher finds his laughter pleasant, for, after all, the ridiculous thing with its mechanical toy-like action is a piece of play, a relaxation from the strain of life for the spectator. "Laughter," said Hobbes, "is a sudden glory." The observer, noting the defect which causes ridicule, yet trifles with it for a while, as even a strict parent may for the moment be amused by some piece of naughtiness on the part of his child.

A GENTLEMAN OF THE RENAISSANCE.*

THE intense vitality of the Renaissance is the secret of its perennial charm. There have been times when the pulse of life beat as strongly, but their records are lost or imperfect; at no period lying in the full light of history did human activity, mental and physical, stand on so high a level, or aspiration burn with so white a flame. The men and women stand out from the canvas; we possess their letters, their diaries, their memoranda: they are strangely outspoken; their secret thoughts are ours. And they are at once like and unlike us, so that, on the one hand, we understand them, and, on the other, they stimulate our curiosity: they represent human nature, but human nature writ large. In "Baldassare Castiglione" the accomplished chronicler of Isabella d'Este gives us a study of the complex life of Italy in the sixteenth century, inferior neither in interest nor in execution to the former work.

The best book that was ever written upon good breeding is Johnson's description of "Il Cortegiano"; and Castiglione's fame rests mainly on its authorship. He was fifty when it was published, 1528; and before the end of the century it had gone through more than a hundred editions, and been translated into four languages. Since Hoby's translation, 1562, sixteen English renderings, three during the last few years, have appeared; and the reputation of the writer rivalled in his time that of the book:—

> "In an age when cleverness was abundant, but character was lacking, he not only believed in virtue but practised it. In circles where crime and treachery were condoned, and to deceive others was held to be the first duty of a diplomat, he spoke the truth boldly, and remained absolutely loyal to his masters. So he moved through those dark scenes of intrigue and bloodshed, wearing the white flower of a blameless life, and gaining the confidence and respect of those who were most unlike him."

Akin through his mother, Luigia Gonzaga, to the reigning house of Mantua, he was trained at Milan at the court of Lodovico Sforza, after whose fall he attached himself first to the Marquis Francesco Gonzaga, and later to Guidobaldo, Duke of Urbino, in whose household his happiest years were passed. Returning on Guidobaldo's death, to the Mantuan service, he became the permanent ambassador of Federico Gonzaga at Rome; finally, having filled the post of Nuncio in Spain under Clement VII., he accepted the bishopric of Avila from Charles V. He died at Toledo, 1529, before he could take possession of his see, the Emperor pronouncing his fittest epitaph: "One of the finest gentlemen in the world is dead."

He affords a striking example of the union of chivalry and scholarship, a union traditional in Italy. The court of the Montefeltro princes, in which he was trained, was the most brilliant of its type. Scholars from every part of Europe flocked to Urbino. Politian praises Duke Frederic as the equal of Lorenzo de'Medici, "the pattern of a wise ruler and perfect man." Here was the difference between the ancient civilisation of Italy and that of the barbaric parvenus of the North. When Louis XII. invaded Milan, 1499, "The French are a dirty people," was the comment of an eyewitness; "everywhere in the Castello there is dirt and foulness, such as Signor Lodovico would not have allowed for all the world." And in the Cortegiano,

> "the French believe only in the nobility of arms, and count all the rest as nothing. They not only despise learning, but they abhor it, and hold scholars to be the vilest of men, thinking that the worst reproach they can address to anyone is to call him a clerk."

It is such glimpses as those of the life of the time that give this memoir its significance. In 1506 Castiglione visited England as proxy for Guidobaldo, on whom Henry VII. had conferred the Garter. He encountered "that dangerous sea, the Channel of England," with better fortune than Philip and Joanna of Castile, who a few months before had been wrecked off Portland; or Julius II., who, when Cardinal, during his exile in France, got as far as Calais, but abandoned his intention of crossing, owing to the roughness of the sea. Shortly after his return, the court of Urbino was the scene of a tragedy which throws a sinister light on the passions which lay below its decorous surface. The Duke's nephew and heir, Francesco della Rovere, a youth of seventeen, having a cause of quarrel with a Veronese knight, Gian Andrea, invited him to dine and fence in his apartments. "After dinner the young men took up their foils and were engaged in the contest, when suddenly two of Francesco's servants entered from behind and seized Gian Andrea by the arms, while the Prefettino himself stabbed his guest to the heart with a knife. After this his servants fell upon the unfortunate man and finished their master's work." It was, indeed, a world of contrasts; and stranger, if possible, than the crime itself, was the comment made on it by Bembo within a few days of its occurrence: "I will keep silence, and will say only this: he who might remain standing, and falls by his own fault, deserves to lie there against his will." Baldassare himself, a man of another type than that of the Græculus esuriens, writes to his mother: "You need not distress yourself about the death of Gian Andrea, may God pardon him! because these things, when they are once done, cannot be undone"—a truly Italian touch! "Everything has been arranged, thanks to the wisdom and dexterity of the Lord Duke; and the Lord Prefect is here again, and is restored to his Excellency's favor, and he who no longer lives is already forgotten."

Three years later the same Francesco murdered Cardinal Alidosi at Ravenna, almost under the eyes of Julius II., and under circumstances of exceptional barbarity. Excommunication followed, but Julius' indignation was short lived; and, though Leo X. renewed the censures, within a month of his death the Duke recovered Urbino, and the duchy, on whose acquisition the Medici Pope had expended so much blood and treasure, was lost to the Holy See.

The side lights thrown on the court of Leo X. are vivid. The Pope, pococurante as he is—"it is not his nature to trouble himself long over anything"—is troubled over the Lutheran revolt; but his anxiety does not interfere with his throwing himself into the carnival celebrations—banquets, comedies, bull-fights, races, &c.: and Baldassare cannot get him to attend to business of any kind. The ambassador of Charles V. kidnaps a Spaniard, and sends him prisoner to Naples. The Pope flames out—"Villain and hypocrite! you think to be lord of Rome," and threatens to cut him in pieces. On his brother's death he is on the point of excommunicating his widow for delaying to return certain family jewels: and finally dies, according to one account, a dog's death, without the sacraments; according to another, with exemplary patience, and with the name of Jesus on his lips. When the plague broke out in Rome, 1522, a bull was sacrificed by its Greek owner to appease the demons of the Coliseum, while processions of the Host and of the Madonna were held—so near akin are the old and new in religion—in the streets. Adrian VI. attempts the reform of the Church, in head and members; but "Nature is averse to sudden changes," writes a contemporary, "and the Curia is more corrupt than ever before." On his deathbed the Cardinals persecute him with questions as to where he had hidden his money, and treat him not like a Pope, but "like a private man on the rack." Of Clement VII., the Pope who lost England, we are told that,

> "He early showed himself a true Medici, and entered on that career of crooked policy, of shifts and subterfuges, that was to bring irretrievable disaster upon the Papacy and the Eternal City. It was Castiglione's fate, like that of many fine souls, to be closely entangled in the meshes of this spider's web, and in the end to become himself its victim."

It is pleasant to know that Clement appreciated, if too tardily, the services of this distinguished man. Multis ille bonis flebilis occidit. "Mi doglio del Castiglione," wrote Bembo to his son at Venice: "I grieve for Castiglione's loss."

THE STYLE OF SWIFT.*

A NEW edition of Swift is an opportunity for arriving at an impartial estimate of his position in the history of literature. This collection of his works does not contain any of his poetry, and therefore we need not discuss the question whether he was a true poet. That he was a great master of English prose is generally assumed. He certainly had the art which conceals art. His sentences produce the impression that there is no other way of saying what he wishes to have said. There are no purple passages in his writings, no digressions, no repetitions, and no ambiguities. Swift liked to appear as a plain man with a definite object, who used language merely for the purpose of expressing simple ideas. It might be thought that such conditions would make style impossible. But Swift had other qualities which made a style for themselves. His irony, his insight, his perspicacity, his power of detaching the true point from all irrelevant circumstances surrounding it, made the form coincide with the substance, and removed the distinction between them. This it is that makes Swift unlike the other great writers of our tongue. He seems never to have thought of anything less vital than the conveyance to his readers of the precise idea which filled his own mind at the moment. Even his humor is quite unforced, and proceeds with apparently inevitable directness from the facts as they are, not from any gloss upon them, or attempt to disguise them. He himself stands aside, as if he were simply an interpreter with no claim and no responsibility, except to put in words things which would otherwise speak for themselves.

Of course, it was not so. Swift was, in truth, a literary artist of consummate power, and his simplicity is designed for the purpose which it fulfils. He owed nothing, so far as we can see, to other writers. Shakespeare he never quotes. To his contemporaries he bears no resemblance. His English is his own, and it is quite free from any tricks or fancies of the passing hour. When Swift wrote a political tract, he meant that it should be equally intelligible to statesmen and to all who could read. Incapable of obscurity, he could put the subtlest argument into the simplest shape, and even persuade his readers that they had thought the subject out for themselves. Addison was the delight of the literary world. Swift went outside it, and appealed to a taste which he really created, to the love of simplicity and lucidity which is a natural instinct of the human mind. His transcendent power of piercing accessories and finding realities gave him the air of putting the reader on a level with himself when he was actually putting himself on a level with the reader. The extreme difficulty of defining Swift's style is that in the ordinary sense of the word he had none. Kant's description of truth as the agreement of the cognition with its object was the essence of Swift's method. He wrote to be understood as the surest way of writing to convince. Those who were not convinced were made to feel that they did not understand. He failed with the few who knew as much about the subject as he knew himself. But how many were they? He aimed at the general reader, whom he coaxed by concealed flattery into the notion that he had thought out the conclusion for himself.

Admiration for Swift's style is thus the more natural because the critic can always suppose that the clearness of his own intelligence enables him to appreciate the lucidity of the author. What Persius says of Horace is true of Swift —"Circum præcordia ludit." Or, as was said of Voltaire, "il a plus que personne l'esprit que tout le monde a." Ordinary styles are easily classified. Swift's defies analysis, because it is not framed on any system, nor, indeed, framed at all. Given the idea to be expressed, any other expression seems impossible, and to alter it is like taking the mainspring out of a watch. If Swift is not much read now, that may be because the issues with which he dealt are closed. It cannot be because the style is out of fashion, for Swift's style does not belong to any particular date or epoch. It owes nothing to modes of thought or speech, nor is it, like Fielding's, formed on classical lines. Only a Greek scholar would have written "Tom Jones." Swift's scholarship, which was not inconsiderable, is never obtruded, except, perhaps, in the "Battle of the Books," where it is rather unfortunately displayed. He wrote also on the "Dissensions at Athens and Rome," a pamphlet which raised Macaulay's opinion of his scholarship. But he was always ready to turn his hand in any direction, and to write for any class of reader. His distinction is that he remains himself in any guise, giving free rein to his intellect, never allowing his subject to carry him away, wielding the full resources of his genius, how homely soever may be his diction, or its setting, on any particular occasion.

It is for that reason, perhaps, that, as he had no master, so he has had no pupils. The "Four Last Years of the Queen's Reign" may be cited as an example of successful imitation. But even the title is bad English, and it is practically certain that Swift did not write the work. Swift would not have thought, or implied, that there would be four last years of anything. Macaulay and Lord Stanhope have given other reasons. But this appears amply sufficient. Swift studied correctness in trifles, if, indeed, he would have admitted that any part of literary composition was a trifle. Logical exactitude, which implies grammatical accuracy, belongs to his method, so far as he had any method at all. It was not that he believed in rules on their own account, but that he wrote in the manner which the best rules were made to produce. Many as were his faults in other directions, his prose was faultless. If this be negative praise, we must consider that it cannot be fairly bestowed upon some of the greatest writers, such as Milton and Burke. Swift deserves it because he wrote with no other ambition than to be intelligible, and abjured everything which could interfere with that single aim. But by bringing the whole force of his mind to bear upon one point, he brought perspicuity to a pitch it had not attained before, and has scarcely attained since. That is what must be borne in view when we scrutinise Swift's writing. We must regard the object and the attainment together. Doubtless there are higher aims than Swift contemplated, and he never tried to be eloquent. But what he tried to do he did, and he knew exactly the limits of his own capacity. His style is the expression of his thought, and to change it would entirely shift the whole character of the passage It is this precise harmony between the thing to be done and the mode of doing it that sets Swift apart from all other writers, ancient or modern. They may rise to heights which he does not scale. He never falls below the level he seeks to reach, because he suits the manner to the matter, and lets the substance prescribe the form. Slovenly or awkward craftsmanship was impossible to him. He suited, as Hamlet says, the word to the action, the action

THE HALF-HIDDEN LIFE.*

Mr. Forster has earned the right to serious criticism. His work—limited to three novels and some shorter stories and sketches—has revealed individuality, distinction, and a power of suggestion which opens large issues. "A Room with a View," the title of his latest book, might stand for a title of all his work. He reveals in minute and exact detail the "room" and its contents: the patterned paper on the walls, the sofas and antimacassars, the elaborate, grotesque, or stuffy artifice of conventional construction. And beyond, he shows the "view": outside man's handiwork, judging, sometimes condemning, always disturbing, the contented occupants of the artificial arena. Dawn flares through the blinds, the sunset casts haunting shadows on the carpets and cushions, outside is the sound of tempest or the challenging silence of the night. And the conflict amongst all his characters—set in the moment where two eternities meet, which is always a moment of supreme choice—arises just from the fact that although their natural and accepted habit approves of the orderly comfort of the "room," there is within all of them some wild or exultant element which responds to the high calling of the "view."

The "room" may take many shapes and forms. In that fascinating and tragic farce, "Where Angels Fear to Tread," it is found (for one nation) in the spreading securities of suburban London, for another in the crumbling dead streets of a little Tuscan city. In "The Longest Journey," it varied from the traditional decencies of the older Universities—with their secret for the fashioning of the completed English gentleman—to the traditional decencies of the English countryside, the English gentleman, completed, pursuing his ordered and tranquil existence in that station of life to which he has been called. In his latest novel the scene also changes; from the English pension at Florence, with its enthusiasm for the work of Karl Baedekker and John Ruskin, to the spreading suburbs of Surrey, in those regions where the new rich and the emigrant clerk are making desolate the hills which look southward to the sea. Both of these are outposts of man's civilisation: both, therefore, places of especial danger. The pension has high bulwarks in the atmosphere of breezy clergymen and maiden ladies, in the advantage which can be given by such outside aids in the city as joint excursions of British tourists, English afternoon tea shops, and the "cultured English community" resident in Florence. But in the immediate background is a nation with a thousand centuries behind it: passion in the city square leading to sudden death: Phaethon and Persephone, who will drive the blithe and unsuspecting party up the hillside to Fiesole, disguised as an Italian coachman and his "sister": with (at the summit) a field blue with violets and the vision of "fifty miles of Italian spring." And the little semi-urban village of the Surrey hillside, although linked firmly to the city by the South Eastern Railway, and stuffed with all the material of contemporary life—illustrated papers, and tennis courts, and clever conversation—has also below it deep pinewoods with a lake in the heart of them, and a wide southern plain leading beyond to one grey glimpse of sea. Here are things which own no allegiance to convention, fit habitation for those which still survive of all the older gods. And to Mr. Forster, as to Heine and others, the older gods have not perished: they but remain, abiding in patience, until the tyranny of denial be overpast. In one of his sketches in the "Independent Review" (not yet republished), "A Panic Fear," in a party on picnic in a valley of Greece, Pan appears for a moment, and asserts his supremacy: in a gust or tumult, suddenly coming and going, no man knowing whether in external Nature or the mind of man. And it is Pan who here appears, in the hills above Florence first, and later in the well-trimmed garden of an English suburban residence in the neighbourhood of Dorking: when George Emerson kisses Lucy Honeychurch, first in violation of all standards of conventional respectability, and later in violation of all standards of conventional honor.

It is this hidden life—secure and silent, and often, through a lifetime, undisturbed—that Mr. Forster sets himself to reveal in the characters of the working world. It is a current flowing, mysterious, elusive, behind the motives and desires which make the web of conscious apprehension. The efforts to explore it are like occasional soundings swung into an unfathomed deep: adventures upon an uncharted shore. The normal activity of existence flows on, men are getting and spending, enjoying bodily exercise, discussing their surface politics, philosophies, and religions: women are "falling in love" with conventional figures, and (for the most part) accepting with satisfaction the affection and the convention. But beyond and behind it all, are tides and oceans which may at any time surge up into the sheltered ports and harbors, and sweep the little craft which have found shelter there far out to sea. The tiny, intelligent life is outraged and defiant: it protests and it weeps, it refuses to face realities, it lies heartily and continuously to the outside world and to itself. Sometimes it triumphs in the re-establishment of order: the ship has regained the shelter again, and its occupants, wasted by the struggle, anchor more firmly in the shadows, and declare that they will never more put out to sea: sometimes the upheaval is permanent: the land drops behind the horizon, and the vessel rides buoyantly over the waste of waters, rejoicing in the challenge of its vast and incalculable tides. And all these spiritual conflicts the author can set—with a quiet and detached vision, more ironical than any deliberate interference or exposition—amid the dust and dead flowers of a tourist-haunted Italian city, or between the tennis-court and the drawing-room of an English suburban villa.

From the beginning of this story of the spiritual adventure of George Emerson and Lucy Honeychurch, the chief protagonists have some advantage denied to their contemporaries; weak places (as it were) in the wrappings of convention, which may wear thin through the influence of circumstance, and leave them exposed to naked reality. George—from start to finish a rather shadowy, indefinite figure—is the son of a father who has refused to accept the recognised standards, just because they are the standards which are recognised. His revolt, indeed, is as much on the surface as the standards themselves: it is not a revolt from the depth: and his protests of emancipation come in the end to exhibit themselves as ridiculous, and as tedious as the normal praises of imprisonment. But he has been teaching his son. "He has the merit," is the explanation of the clergyman, "of saying exactly what he means. He no more thought of putting you under an obligation than he thought of being a bore. It is so difficult—at least I find it difficult—to understand people who speak the truth." "A type," is the summary, "one disagrees with rather than deplores." Lucy finds him willing to act as guide in Santa Croce. "I hope you have not been put to any great inconvenience," she declares. "My dear," the old man answers, "I think that you have been repeating what you have heard older people say. You are pretending to be touchy. But you are not, really Stop being so tiresome." His loud and incredulous comments in the Peruzzi Chapel drive forth in silent indignation a congregation and lecturer "directing them how to worship Giotto, not by tactile valuations, but by the standards of the spirit." "My father has that effect on everyone," explains George, ruefully, "he will try to be kind." "I hope we all try," said she, smiling nervously. "Because we think it improves our characters," he answers; "but he is kind to people because he loves them: and they find it out, and are offended or frightened."

And Lucy, though springing from and encompassed by convention, has radiant youth on her side, and music, with a reaction also, intensifying in bitterness, against her cousin and companion Miss Bartlett, a spinster too obviously dedicated to the worship of false gods. In her playing, "passion was there, but it could not be easily labelled: it slipped between love and hatred and jealousy; and all the furniture of the pictorial style. And she was tragical only in the sense that she was great, for she loved to play on the side of Victory." And she is not unmoved also by the general spirit of revolt and vague disturbance: which has come to one who "reigned in many an Early Victorian castle, and was queen of much Early Victorian song."

> "In her heart, also, there are springing up strange desires. She, too, is enamoured by heavy winds, and vast panoramas, and green expanses of the sea. She has marked the kingdom of this world, how full it is of wealth and beauty and war—a radiant crust, built around the central fires, spinning towards the receding heavens. Men, declaring that she inspires them to it, move joyfully over the surface, having the most delightful meetings with other men; happy, not because they are masculine, but because they are alive. Before the show breaks up, she would like to drop the august title of the Eternal Woman, and go there as her transitory self."

Given these persons, the machinery of Chance or Natural Design effects the rest. The unrestful challenge of old things in Florence is stimulated by the emotional experience of a murder in the Square; then a spring expedition to the hills, and a chance encounter there, when Pan had scattered the excursionists, breaks through the recognised barriers. In a vision of the earth's exuberance, violets appearing as beauty gushing out to water the earth, he, a man, sees her, a woman; nothing else but the approving earth under a limitless sky. From that moment the thing works itself out to inevitable conclusion. There is the spirit of high comedy in it. Mr. Forster can describe with sure touch the queer satisfactions and still queerer repugnances which make up the strange region of modern things. Had this element been there alone, the book would have been merely an excellent satirical judgment of manners and conventions. Had the other element stood alone—the revelation of the hidden life—it would have been mystical, intangible, illusory. By the fusion of the one with the other, he is able to present work humorous and arresting, with a curious element in it of compelling strength and emotion.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

Dr. Emil Reich tells us in the preface to his latest work, "Woman Through the Ages" (Methuen, 2 vols., 21s.), that, "more especially in this country, there is no easier way of making oneself looked down upon than by paying attention to the rôle of woman in social and historical life." Dr. Reich disdains to give any reasons for this statement, doubtless believing that it is self-evident, and, undeterred by the risk of so terrible a fate, he has stepped into the breach, resolved on helping "a few Englishmen to get out of that chinoiserie d'idées." An examination of his two volumes convinces us that the Englishmen who will be helped by them are very few indeed, and at the same time causes us to wonder whether any other living author could have written them, with the possible exception of Miss Corelli. For this is no ordinary work. The glowing scroll of history flies before our eyes with unparalleled velocity. Thirty-four pages tell all that needs to be said about the position, dress, amusements, duties, education, and marriage and divorce customs of the women of ancient Egypt, with an excusus dealing with Cleopatra thrown in, and then we reach the Greeks. "Greek!" exclaims Dr. Reich, and he explains his exclamation by the sweeping generalisation, "All their (the Greeks') actions and all their thoughts were concerned with the living essence of humanity." "Can we imagine," he asks, "that a similar Renaissance (to that following the sack of Constantinople) would have been the result if the libraries of Constantinople had contained the writings of Confucius and other Chinese philosophers, or records of the ancient Egyptians?" And we are constrained to answer with Dr. Reich, "Assuredly no." We take breath and pause before the Venus of Milo, remembering that "she is human and super-human. Not a desire of man's darkest or most ideal longings for womanhood but could be satisfied by a woman such as the Lady of Milo; and yet no man would ever dare to approach her with any hope of winning her." Passing on, we pick up such crumbs as that "the French no longer make history, they write it"; that "to be able to think, read, and converse in several languages insures a breadth and a grasp which those who are confined to their own tongue can never obtain"; that "the Germans have very profound thinkers"; that "the chin (of American women) has, indeed, no charm; but the shoulders are frequently magnificent, and the women of New York and Kentucky have also fine hips." Besides a great deal more of like nature, Dr. Reich's readers will find some short biographical sketches of a number of famous women, ranging from Cleopatra and Aspasia to Charlotte Brontë and George Eliot. They will find a chapter on "The Feminism of the Nineteenth Century," and a disquisition in which Dr. Reich laments "the process of unwomaning the American women," though he admits that "no human power or foresight could obviate" it. But we do not think that Dr. Reich has done much to help them out of their chinoiserie d'idées. They are more likely to resent the offer of this scrappy piece of book-making as a serious contribution to the study of "the rôle of woman in social and historical life."

Mr. J. M. Bulloch's "The Gay Gordons: Some Strange Adventures of a Famous Scots Family" (Chapman & Hall, 10s. 6d. net), relates a lively and amusing series of episodes. The book is described as "an attempt to illustrate some well-defined characteristics of the family in several centuries, different countries, and under varying conditions." Its author is well qualified for his task. He is editor of "The House of Gordon," an encyclopaedic undertaking, two volumes of which have already appeared under the auspices of the New Spalding Club of Aberdeen, and it is safe to say that few men are as well acquainted with the history of the Gordon family. The episodes given in the present work range from the marriage of Lady Catherine Gordon to Perkin Warbeck down to the adventures of the Sixth Earl of Aberdeen, who spent three and a-half years as a seaman in America, and was swept overboard from his ship in 1870. A pronounced intolerance of discipline, and a readiness to embark on any adventure that presented itself, seem to have been distinguishing traits of most of the Gordons, with the result that Mr. Bulloch's pages are packed with incident, and resemble one of Dumas' novels rather than the recital of actual events. When we say that among the contents are sketches of Colonel John Gordon, who kept the door while Wallenstein was assassinated, and got the credit, though wrongly, of having himself committed the actual murder, of George Gordon, who, beginning as a soldier, became one of the earliest "parsons" of Gretna Green, of Lord William Gordon, whose elopement with Lady Sarah Bunbury caused so great a sensation in 1768, of the brothers Gordon who were tried for the abduction of Mrs. Lee, "the female infidel" in 1804, and of Lord George Gordon, the hero of the "No Popery" riots, the reader will have some notion of the interest and variety of the book. Mr. Bulloch does full justice to his subject. He writes with verve and humor.

The third and fourth volumes of the edition of Mr. William Yeats's collected works have been issued (Shakespeare Head, Stratford-on-Avon, £4 4s. the set of eight volumes). They contain most of his earlier dramas and dramatic sketches—"Countless Cathleen," "The Land of Heart's Desire," "The Unicorn from the Stars," "Cathleen Ni Houlihan," and others, besides the admirable series of essays on the revival of the Irish drama; or perhaps we ought to say, of the drama in Ireland, for no literature written in a foreign language can really be Irish. We have already noticed the first two volumes of this beautiful edition, and if those two are likely to be most popular because they are full of this rare poet's lyrical magic, it is certain that the poet himself now lays the greater stress on the dramatic form, and believes the writers who move men must find their chief power there.

AFTER six months of exceedingly cheap money, the Stock Exchange has been aroused to the fact that such a condition has an ending, and that the possibility of a rise in the Bank of England minimum is well within the range of immediate politics. It is, of course, a common thing for able editors of the newspaper columns which are devoted to City affairs to twit bankers, discount houses, and Stock Exchange men with abysmal ignorance of the absorbing subject of money and the Money Market, and these critics profess a proper contempt for Capel Court prophecies that the Bank rate will rise to 3 per cent. before the end of the year. There is no need to break a lance in the arena of controversy in order to show that the Stock Exchange, at all events, is having to pay considerably more for its financial accommodation than has been the case for several months. The carrying-over rates just charged to such buyers of securities who preferred to continue their commitments for another fortnight, without finding the cash, displayed a rising tendency which rather surprised even the money experts in the Stock Exchange, where as much as 5½ per cent. was obtained upon stocks so good as London and North-Western and other similar investments. This stiffening of money rates reflected adversely upon markets in the best and the better class securities, and brought about a general weakening of prices, which spread from Consols downwards.

MR. BIRRELL'S IRISH CONUNDRUM.

Seldom has the Consul Market been so completely puzzled over a matter affecting itself as in the case of Mr. Birrell's pronouncement affecting the Irish Land Purchase Bill. All kinds of constructions can be placed upon the possible intentions of the Government with respect to the issue of more stock to pay the landlords, but the actual result of the uncertainty has been to depress quotations still further, and to add one more to the clouds which overhang Consols, militating against advance in the price. It is quite probable, of course, that had Mr. Birrell been perfectly explicit, the consequence to the market would have been just the same as that brought about by the lack of a definite, cut-and-dried declaration of how the money would be raised, by what amounts at a time, in what form of security, and at what rate of interest. It cannot be reasonably urged that the market is a penny the worse for not having the precise information, but at the same time it is not unnatural that Mr Birrell should be prayed to dispel the various doubts with a more luminous interpretation of his speech. At present the market is faced with a financial conundrum, the answer to which must be given up, as the children say, until the oracle unravels the problem.

BREWERY STOCKS ONCE MORE.

Something like fifty brewery stocks and shares have risen in price during the current week, as a response to the solemn farce transferred from the stage of Lansdowne House on Tuesday to the floor of the House of Lords on Wednesday. The slaughter of the Licensing Bill has brought about timid advances in the quotations of such brewery issues as happened to be in a little demand; but it is needless to say that the revival has in no way replaced the decline which occurred when the Licensing Bill was originally introduced, some months ago. That dramatic series of falls, over which the opponents of the Government gloated with such open delight, was about as artificial a demonstration as ever took place in any market of the Stock Exchange. For months and months prior to the introduction of the Bill, the market for brewery securities had fallen into a parlous condition, relieved only by a flash in the pan early this year, which served as an excuse for pushing up prices in a manner out of all proportion to the real amount of business transacted. As a matter of hard fact, there were dozens of instances amongst brewery stocks where any substantial sum could not have been sold at the lower of the wide prices quoted in the Stock Exchange Official List. The introduction of the Licensing Bill was cleverly seized as an opportunity for reducing prices to something like their intrinsic levels, and a better advertisement for the case against the measure could hardly have been conceived. On all sides arose accusing fingers, pointed at those falls in brewery stocks and shares, while the indignant owners—who could not have sold in any amount the securities at the official prices before the fall took place—vibrated with pious horror at the result of such alleged confiscation as the Government proposed. In some instances, of course, the market value was certainly depreciated. A few timid holders hastened to sell while they could save a stick from the threatened deluge, but in many more cases the movement was artificial, hollow, insincere. How insincere may be judged from the unanimous opinion expressed round the Stock Exchange that in its then shape the Bill could never pass; that, in any shape, the House of Lords would probably reject it; while, moreover, to buy first-class stocks at the reduced levels was almost as difficult as it was to sell them. The market froze up, though the process of marking-down went steadily on. The Stock Exchange cannot be blamed unreservedly for its share in the matter. Owing to the narrowness of the market, and the unwillingness displayed for years past of the public to deal largely in brewery stocks after the public-house boom, the quotations had grown by degrees more and more nominal. Untested by actual transactions, they had rusted in a groove from which even the slight revival in the earlier part of the year had not entirely shaken them. Then came the Licensing Bill, and brewery stockholders, not knowing to what extent it would influence their interests—knowing, withal, that they had been tempted to pay preposterous prices for their securities at the "boom" time—sent eager messages to their brokers to see what the stocks would realise. It is necessary thus to delve a little into history, to understand the present position of the market, where much the same narrowness and difficulty of dealing continue to prevail, in spite of the Peers' championship of beer, and all that beer means. Prices are advancing, it is true, but even the present buyers are none too easy in their minds as to what may be the next development in the fight for control of the drink traffic.

Diary of the Week.

After the pretence of a debate, the House of Lords, sitting at Westminster on Friday week, gave effect to its resolution in favor of rejecting the Licensing Bill, passed three days earlier when sitting at Lansdowne House. It has thus declared itself, both in form and in effect, to be a mere branch of the Tory Party. Stripping itself of the character of a revising and amending body which later Constitutionalists have assigned to it, it has now destroyed every first-class political measure of a Government elected by the largest majority ever known in a modern Parliament, and has reduced the Liberal Party to impotence. For the present, the Government has remained silent under this unparalleled affront, but three counsels prevail in the Parliamentary party. The first is for the Ministry to bend to the lash, and to propose for the next two years only non-combative—that is to say, not distinctively Liberal—measures. This, we need not say, is the end of Liberalism as a political force. The second is an immediate dissolution. The third is the abandonment of all large issues, save the Budget, on the plea that the Government cannot evade the honorable obligation of financing Old-Age Pensions. If the last policy is adopted, the dissolution will take place in the early summer on the existence of the House of Lords.

The division on the Licensing Bill showed a majority of 176 against the Bill, 272 voting against it and 96 in its favor. The 96, however, included the flower of the statesmanship of the Peers. Both Archbishops and ten Bishops supported it, and four other Bishops were paired in its favor. No member of the Episcopal Bench opposed the Bill, which was also rather significantly befriended by Lord Knollys, the King's Secretary, by Lord Milner, Lord Esher, Lord Lytton, and Lord Balfour of Burleigh. Not one speech of weight was delivered in support of the policy of rejection of the principle of the measure, nor did any critic of the Bill show any feeling of the gravity of the drink evil. The most impressive argument in its favor was delivered by the Lord Chancellor, who, quoting a Judge, declared that eleven out of twelve cases tried at a recent Assize were directly due to drink, and the twelfth indirectly, and that ninety per cent. of cases of cruelty to children had the same cause. Lord Lytton hinted at the necessity of fresh negotiation; but we believe that the Government feel themselves relieved of further liability. On the other hand, the Primate is likely to promote a Bill taking up the regulative clauses of the Ministerial measure, but omitting the time-limit and the scheme for the reduction of licences.

A frost has been breathed on the hopes of an educational settlement. On Monday night the Primate communicated to Mr. Runciman a letter in which, basing himself on the figures of the National Society, he asked for a large increase in the rental of schools transferred to the State and in the grants offered to contracted-out schools. He was answered by Mr. Runciman in a letter which gravely shook the accuracy of the figures on which the Primate relied, and contained a firm refusal to go beyond the average grant of 50s. According to the Archbishop, this grant would leave the Church to find a balance of over 14s. from her funds. According to the estimates of the Department, she would only have to find about 10s., or one-sixth of the whole burden of maintenance. If the figures of 1901 are any guide, the Church will be overwhelmingly provided with funds to meet any reasonable amount of contracting-out.

But the inference of the Liberal Party is that the Primate is now being driven to provide for an area of contracted-out schools so large as practically to destroy the unity of the school system, while the Church obtains free entry to every part of it. Sir George White, speaking for the Nonconformist Committee, declared that he could not support the Church's demand of an extra 7s. a child, and that if it were persisted in, he must abandon hope of a settlement. This unfavorable view was strengthened by the voting at the meeting of the Church Representative Council, at which an almost impassioned appeal for peace by the Primate was met by a motion of the Bishop of Salisbury, which, though less drastic than the hostile resolution of Sir Alfred Cripps, declined to recommend the Council to accept the Bill "without serious amendment." But even this tepid advance to the Government was rejected, and the Cripps motion was carried against almost the whole bench of Bishops by 189 to 99. The laymen were more than two to one against the settlement. On the other hand, the negotiations between the Primate and Mr. Runciman have not been broken off, and efforts are being made to find a new way out of the financial difficulty. One party proposes to revive the famous Fourth Clause of Mr. Birrell's Bill; another suggests that the Church should agree to pay one-sixth of the cost of maintaining contracted-out schools, the State guaranteeing the supply of the other five-sixths.

On Thursday the Government, doubly discouraged by the triumph of the extremists in the Representative Church Council, and by the Primate's sudden demand for higher terms, announced the postponement of the Education Bill. The Ministerial ranks seemed relieved, and we doubt whether, after the reaction in the Liberal Party produced by the financial demands of the National Society, and the proof that contracting-out on a large scale is part of the Church's educational policy, terms of peace are any longer possible. The Nonconformists Dissidents have issued a strongly worded appeal against the Bill, declaring that, if it passes, strife will only be transferred from Parliament to the schools. As we write these words, we hear the news of the final abandonment of the Bill.

The Mid-Essex Election has resulted in the election of a Tory landlord, familiar to the constituency. Captain Pretyman's majority was 2,565, the highest known in Mid-Essex since 1900, when it was 3,129. He was a Tariff Reformer, and after election claimed Chelmsford as "standing for" the Protectionist faith. It appears also to stand for a good deal of brutal horse-play which Mr. Pretyman might fairly have repudiated. The constituency has always been strongly Conservative, but the election reveals a falling-off of 800 in the Liberal vote, and an increase of over 1,200 in the Tory vote of 1906, when Sir Carne Rasch, a popular and rather interesting figure, with knowledge of agricultural problems, was the candidate. The result, like that in other contests, shows that Liberalism wants a rallying policy, without which its strength declines, even in rural constituencies, which cannot be deeply bitten with Protection. The Tariff Reformers, on their side, claim a great organisation, which secures them an accession of strength in nearly every type of constituency.

The Select Committee of the House of Lords, which has attempted to draw up a scheme for changing the constitution of that body, has issued its report. It has no relevance to the overwhelming issue between the Commons and the Lords, and, save as a sign of an uneasy conscience, has no value. Indeed, it sets up a more definitely reactionary and Conservative body than that which now exists, for (a) it provides for the election of a solid, or almost solid, block of 200 Conservative peers, (b) it proposes to set limits to the creation of peers by an Administration. In other words, it would destroy the one direct weapon that a Liberal Government possesses against the most extreme abuse by the Lords of their Constitutional power. Thus it is quite possible that the Lords may throw out a democratic Budget next year. In that case Mr. Asquith may well ask the King for a creation of peers large enough to drown the unconstitutional majority. This would be forbidden under the plan of the Committee. Lord Rosebery's proposal, which suggested that each Government, on succeeding to office, should send up a fixed quota of forty peers, and that in the event of differences between the two Houses there should be a Referendum, does at least suggest the direction in which the Liberal Party might look at a "reform" of the House of Lords.

For the rest, the Rosebery Committee, on which only four independent Whigs, or Liberals, sat, proposes a slight concentration and strengthening of the Tory element in the Lords, obtained by self-election, and backed by a quasi-official, quasi-representative element from within. It qualifies the hereditary principle, by distinguishing between a peer and a "Lord of Parliament," but gives it control of the character of the reconstituted Chamber. It would substitute a House of nearly 400 members for a House of about 600, abler, but not a whit more progressive, than the present assembly. The elements would be as follows:—

Lords of Parliament.

Royal Peers	3
Representative peers, elected by all the hereditary peers, and chosen afresh for each Parliament...	200
Qualified peers, such as Ministers, high State officials, and Imperial servants, &c.	130
Life peers (four a year)	40
Representative spiritual peers (Nonconformists excluded)	10
Lords of Appeal	5

The financial and political basis of the Parliamentary Labor Party has been severely shaken by a decision of the Court of Appeal on the power of a majority in a trade union to provide for Parliamentary representation by a forced levy on all its members. This decision, which was invited by a member of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants who objected to its association with the Labor Party, affects all the Labor Members, and not merely the delegates of the Labor Representation Committee. The Master of the Rolls—an impartial and even liberal-minded Judge—held that it was ultra vires for a trade union to make levies on its members for purposes of Parliamentary representation.

Lord Justice Moulton went further than this. He insisted that the definition of a trade union as a body established to regulate the relations between employers and employed excluded Parliamentary action, and also that it was "against public policy" to seek to bind a Member of Parliament to vote and act "in a prescribed manner," he being a "representative," and not merely a "delegate." These obiter dicta raise wide issues, and practically challenge the later course of democratic politics. All the Judges concerned were agreed, but the case is being taken to the House of Lords, we imagine, with little or no hope of success. The trade unions and the Labor Party will await the result, but they are already pressing for a Bill abolishing the new disability which the Judges have laid upon the Labor movement. Such a measure may be difficult to frame, and we cannot conceive that the House of Lords will look at a proposal to enable trade unions to turn themselves into political bodies, with a Socialist basis and policy. Payment of Members presents itself as an obvious remedy, but the trade unions would have to reconcile themselves to the loss of their special representation. Individual trade unionists can, of course, still subscribe to the election and maintenance of Members of Parliament. Apparently the Labor Party has funds enough to carry on for another year.

With very little preliminary trumpeting in public the United States and Japan have come to an important understanding with regard to China and the Pacific. Both Governments express their wish for the free and peaceful development of their commerce in the Pacific, and pledge themselves to the maintenance of the status quo in that region, and to the defence of the "open door" in China. In accordance with these aims they undertake to respect one another's possessions in the Pacific, to preserve the common interests of all Powers in China, and to support by all peaceful means the independence and integrity of China and the preservation of the open door. In the event of anything threatening the status quo or the open door, the two Governments agree to consult together as to the measures they consider it useful to take.

The form of this agreement is an exchange of notes so as to avoid the necessity for submitting it to the American Senate for ratification, and the last provision does not, of course, as some American papers suggest, amount to an alliance or anything like it. The understanding belongs to that lengthy series of international agreements for maintaining the status quo made during recent years. But it differs from the North Sea, Baltic, and Mediterranean agreements in that it includes the "open door," i.e., the commercial as well as the political status quo. The use of the comprehensive term Pacific Ocean should cover Australasia as well as the American coasts, so that the new agreement strikes a severe blow at the yellow peril bogey. It should dispel all fear of a war between Japan and the United States, and may weaken the agitation for the construction of a new American fleet. The strengthening of "the relations of friendship," and "the preservation of the general peace" are its avowed objects. But there is an assumption underlying all its clauses that the United States and Japan are the Powers who divide between them the mastery of the Pacific.

The debate in the French Chamber on the Foreign Affairs Budget was notable for a frank and pregnant speech by M. de Pressensé, the distinguished Socialist deputy, who was for eighteen years director of the foreign department of the "Temps." M. de Pressensé pointed out that the recent Casablanca crisis was precipitated by the misrepresentations in the French Press with regard to the nature of Germany's demands and the time at which they had been made. Every French Government since 1870 had abandoned the "revanche" as a practical policy, but none tried to destroy the "revanche" spirit which influential classes and journals deliberately propagated for sinister purposes. The strained and embittered relations between the two countries made the fear of war a chronic nightmare, and the peace of Europe would never be assured until France did to Germany what she had done to England after Fashoda—came to an understanding. The French working-classes demanded that the network of alliances and understanding should lose its aggressive and bellicose character by being extended to embrace Germany. If that step were not taken the possibility must be faced of another Sedan or Metz, provoked this time by a bankrupt Radicalism. The Foreign Minister's reply to this indictment was the usual charge of anti-patriotism; but M. Jaurès, who dealt with Morocco and Turkey, managed to extract from him a promise to import some cordiality into French relations with Mulai Hafid, and not to make the sacrifice of Turkish interests part of a bargain with Morocco.

The South African Conference is now at Cape Town, and has resumed its sittings, which are expected to last till February. As the draft Constitution will have to be approved by the various States and peoples before it can be shaped into an Imperial Act of Parliament, it is hardly likely to come before the Imperial Parliament next year. The proceedings of the Conference are being kept secret, but Reuter announces that the delegates are unanimously in favor of unification on the Canadian plan, as opposed to Federation on the Australian. If this is true, the arrangement is evidently a compromise, for the Canadian system is not real "unification," though it has the advantage over the Australian Federal system of reserving to the national Government all powers which are not expressly granted to the provincial Governments, and gives to the national Government very considerable authority over the provincial Governments. The preservation of the State Legislature in even this attenuated form would be as much a concession to the native difficulty as to particularism. The delegates do not seem to be able to agree to a uniform native franchise, and the maintenance of the State Parliament obviously provides room for a compromise. Another problem which is giving the delegates a great deal of trouble is what to do with the native Protectorates. These can hardly, with a United South Africa, remain under Imperial control. But the Imperial Government is under the most solemn pledges to preserve the natives' rights to the land.

The negro President of the Republic of Haiti, Nord Alexis, has been driven from his chair, as the result of the revolution headed by General Simon. His life was threatened by a raging mob, and was only saved by the French Minister, who covered his body with the tri-color, and escorted him to a French cruiser. He had held office for six years, and will probably be succeeded by his successful rival. His retreat was followed by rioting and pillage at Port-au-Prince, but the black Republics are capable of managing their own affairs, and the more or less satisfactory Government of Haiti will go on.

A point of some consequence has arisen in the practical relations of the two Houses of Parliament. Lord Morley is to introduce his Indian Reform Bill in the House of Lords. The Prime Minister was asked on Tuesday whether a simultaneous statement would be made in the House of Commons, and replied in effect in the negative. But has not the House of Commons, to which the Indian Budget is always presented, a Constitutional right to such a statement? And is not a discussion in the House of Commons necessary to the issue of a measure vitally affecting the conditions of British rule in India?

Politics and Affairs.

THE ISSUE FOR LIBERALISM.

In face of the constitutional issue raised by the House of Lords, we trust that the Liberal Party is not so rudderless as at first sight it appears to be. The question of temperance reform is one of the gravest, yet it is neither so grave nor so deep as the question of the Constitution which it has provoked. It is now nearly two years since the House of Lords destroyed the first Session's work of the newly-elected House of Commons, by mutilating the Education Bill and rejecting the Plural Voting Bill. It was then felt on all hands that a critical situation had arisen. The Lords had acted as a partisan body. After ten years of quiescence during the Unionist tenure of power, when they had passed without difficulty Bills of the most contentious nature, Bills which the popular verdict of 1906 had condemned, they suddenly burst into activity on the return of the Liberals to office, and discovered themselves once more to be trustees of the nation. Their idea of trusteeship was exhibited at its real worth by the speeches in which Lord Lansdowne and Lord Halsbury explained their selection of this measure to live and that to die. It was admitted that they chose their own ground for fighting, and passed measures which their sense of public duty condemned if they considered that resistance to those measures would be dangerous to themselves. From that time onwards the position was defined. There could be no doubt that the Lords had abdicated, if they ever held, the position of an impartial, revising Chamber, and had become a mere rearguard of the forces of Conservatism, occupying a position from which they could only be dislodged by a frontal attack.

The Liberal Government appeared for the moment to grasp the situation, and gave prominence in the King's Speech to the necessity for an adjustment of the relations between the two Houses. This necessity was subsequently emphasised, after a delay which has never been explained, by a resolution affirming the ultimate right of the House of Commons to prevail. Of this resolution the Lords took no notice. They continued to mutilate or throw out whatever measures they chose. They let go an English Land Bill, which they deemed innocuous—and it has yet to be proved that they were mistaken—while they threw out the Scottish Land Bill, which was undoubtedly radical, and which has throughout had the strong support, affirmed in election after election, of the Scottish people. Still, no action was taken by the Government. Now advancing a step, they have thrown out, without condescending to discuss details, a Licensing Bill, which was no mere party measure, but enjoyed the support of men of influence in all classes and of all parties, and even of the majority of authoritative names within their own body. It might have been thought that this would create one of those situations in which "the chassepots go off of themselves." But nothing of the kind has occurred. Ministers, with the exception of Mr. Birrell, who emphasizes the difficulty of doing anything at all, are silent. The typical party papers admit openly the impossibility of wasting time by preparing any further contentious measures, and, at the same time, contemplate another two years of life for the present Parliament under these conditions of impotence. No longer tacitly, but openly and avowedly, it would seem, the Liberal majority is to recognise the actual supremacy of the House of Lords in legislation. "Anything rather than a dissolution" is still the motto of some people who call themselves Liberals without realising that the effective work of Liberalism in the British State is almost at an end.

We cannot believe that this will be the final attitude of the party as a whole. Something much more than the seats of members is at stake. The question is whether the Liberal Party is prepared to fight the battle of the Constitution, or to encounter dissolution in a far more complete and final sense. If it fights it may, we all know, be beaten. But if it goes down fighting it will rise again, and no future Liberal Government will take office without the requisite assurances from the King that the Constitutional means available for compelling the Lords to submit to the will of the people will be put in force. But if, for the sake of a little longer life, it goes to the country with an admission of impotence, it will go down without fighting, and will disappear as a force that counts in public life. Every Session that passes makes the fight more difficult. It is incomparably more difficult now than it would have been two years ago. It will be impossible if postponed for two years more, when the powers now claimed by the Lords will have hardened into an acknowledged usage. The main result of five years' rule by a Liberal majority of unparalleled strength will have been to establish the Hereditary House as the supreme disposing power in the Constitution.

What is the alternative? We do not press for a January dissolution. We think that the next Budget should be brought in by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Government have set up Old Age Pensions, and should find the money for them. They have, in particular, to show that the money can be found without infringing Free Trade by drawing on the surplus wealth of the community. They have also to secure, by taxation of the monopoly value of public-houses, the financial side of the rejected Bill, and we think that they might concurrently define the issues by passing a Land Valuation Bill, which would occupy little time. But they should, we think, realise and publicly announce without delay that the passing of the next Budget will exhaust their powers of usefulness under present conditions, and they should appeal to the people accordingly for authority to alter those conditions. The way and means thereto are not obscure. The resolution of 1907 has been inoperative. It remains to give it shape and substance in a Bill which would contribute the first and principal legislative work of next Session. If this Bill were accepted by the Lords the situation would, of course, be cleared, but, assuming its rejection, it would be followed by an immediate appeal to the country, accompanied with the clear intimation that no Liberal Ministry would retain or resume office without being entrusted by the King with the necessary powers for securing the acceptance of such a Bill by the House of Lords. If the party succeeds, the constitutional question would be solved, and the democracy would at last be master in its own house. If it fails for the time the party would have a living issue to fight, which would inspire it in Opposition and eventually bring it back to power.

The alternative is creeping paralysis. We cannot tell what Ministers will decide. But of one thing we are certain. The life and vigor of the Liberal Party depend on numbers of men and women throughout the country who have no manner of love for politics as a game, but have a very real feeling for political freedom, for economic justice, for humanitarian progress. Hitherto, believing that the Labor Party offered no practical alternative, they have put all their knowledge and fervor into the work of the Liberal Party as the great available instrument of reform. Let them be convinced that this instrument is useless, that its edge is dull and its keenness gone, and they will turn to other ways. They will not lift a finger to put back in power men who can make no effective use of it, and will not risk it in the people's cause. Their revolt may be silent, but it will be final.

THE TRIUMPH OF THE WRECKERS.

We hope that if the educational compromise breaks down, as now appears probable, the grounds of its failure will be clearly understood. One cause is indeed open to the world, and that is the faithlessness of the Anglican Extremists, and especially of the High Churchmen, to the Primate. By a majority of 189 to 99 the clergy and laity constituting the Representative Church Council, which virtually speaks for Convocation, have rejected the Runciman Bill. Neither the Primate's appeal, delivered almost from a sick bed, nor the counsels of the overwhelming majority of the Bishops, availed. The speeches against the Bishop of Salisbury's timid motion made it clear that even if the Bill went through, it would not be allowed to pass into the educational fabric as an instrument of peace. It would be used as a lever for obtaining further concessions. It is this spirit of exaction, we are afraid, which has ruled the Primate's very late definition of the terms of contracting-out. We cannot believe that Dr. Davidson fully considered them or he must have realised that they struck at the whole character of the settlement. Let us for a moment examine them, and state the conclusive reasons which led Mr. Runciman to reject them. They deal nominally with shillings and pence, and, in passing, we think it most unfortunate that the Church should have made her stand on a matter of money. But their presentation is a matter of far-reaching consequence, throwing strong light on the character and aims of the forces which threaten to dominate Anglican statesmanship.

The Primate asked, in effect, for an extra grant of seven shillings a child for the contracted-out schools, and for higher rents for schools transferred to the public authority. The second of the claims was not unjust, and the Government at once met it. They doubled the scale of rentals adopted in the present schedule of the Bill. They were willing to pay a rack rent for all the teachers' houses they took over. They offered special terms for buildings erected since the Act of 1902. Even on the contracting-out terms they agreed, and with propriety, that the grants to the contracted-out schools should rise in proportion to the rising cost of education. But they remained firm on the question of the scale. Their reason was made clear both in Mr. Runciman's speech and in his letter. The figures too hastily adopted by the Primate were torn to pieces by the Minister for Education, and, indeed, we should be surprised to see them presented in any secular or purely commercial issue. The statement was made on a number of estimates taken from 140 schools, or only three per cent. of the establishments open to contracting-out. Even these few samples were swollen by methods which may mildly be called improper, such as the treatment of rent as a charge of maintenance. They proved that, under the Government's scale of grants, the average deficiency in the cost of educating each child would be 14s. 6d. Mr. Runciman showed clearly that eliminating the items by which these estimates were swollen, the deficiency was about 10s. a child. Can the Church supply this sum? On her own showing she can find it several times over. In 1901, before rate-aid was given, she provided, from local sources, about 10s. a child. Let us admit that this income has been diminished to the extent of 4s.—a very handsome allowance. Even if as many as 1,000 schools were contracted-out, the Church would then have a fund at her disposal amounting to 60s. a child. If 2,000 were contracted-out, she would have a revenue of 30s. a child. Under these circumstances, the Government naturally stood firm, and the whole Liberal Party stood with them. They were, we think, quite right to be liberal in the matter of rent, for that is an encouragement to the Church to open her schools. But they could never consent to widen the area of contracting-out by putting a premium on withdrawal from the national system which is the groundwork of the Bill, especially when they had assured themselves that the Church—one of the richest in the world—had an ample maintenance fund to fall back on.

On these lines, therefore, negotiations have necessarily been stayed. But we put it to the leaders of the Church that they cannot, either in practice or in policy, leave the issue where the Primate's letter appears to fix it. The figures we have criticised were produced by the Society which from the first has been a rooted enemy of the settlement. Their import was obvious. If the Government had been persuaded by them to place a heavy premium on contracting out, then the public spirit of the Nonconformists, now powerfully enlisted on the side of peace, would have risen against it. The Church would have retained her largest and most powerful schools, paying the merest trifle for their maintenance, and fixing them for ever on the general body of taxpayers, while every other school in the country was thrown open to her ministers to teach their creeds and formulae. Why should the Church grasp at such a position? She is presumably a religious body, not a mere organiser of institutions. Under the Bill she secures a far wider range of spiritual guardianship than she has ever obtained before. She can look after every child in her widely-scattered flock. The debate on Wednesday night showed that, under the right of entry, the Catechism can be taught in the public schools as often as it is taught in any Church schools in the Kingdom. Being the most powerful and best organised religious body, it is clear that she can influence the management of the public schools to which she has now gained admission. Every legitimate aspiration of a religious body, looking to the mass of the people as coming within its care, is fulfilled, and more than fulfilled. Is the Church really going to destroy the entente with Nonconformity and with Liberalism by abandoning her historic rôle and shrinking back into the hard-fisted particularism towards which the policy of the National Society drives her?

We still hope against hope that a way of peace will be found, and a limit set to the bargaining spirit into which the Church seems for the moment to have been betrayed, with the apparent aim of providing for a huge special area of her own outside the public system, and of inducing a Liberal Government to finance it. If the Church wants more money for her High Anglican schools, she must, in fairness, consent to a limitation of the area of contracting-out. Is the Primate willing to concede this? Hitherto we have all assumed that the contracted-out schools were to be numbered by hundreds, not by thousands. There was to be "a minimum," not a maximum. The Primate had also, we imagine, pledged himself personally, during his negotiations with Mr. Runciman, that the Church should find a "substantial" part of the maintenance fund. If this is in his mind he can surely give some effect to it, provided he retains any power to bind the Church of which he is the executive chief. He can agree either that the Church shall find a definite proportion of the cost of maintenance, say one-sixth, or he can consent to some such limitation to the number of contracted-out schools as Mr. Birrell's Bill provided. We should much prefer such a setttlement, for it would include the Catholics, whose case does present a possible, though not, we think, a serious grievance, under Mr. Runciman's Bill. But if the Church Extremists wreck the settlement, all of us will draw, firmly and irrevocably, to the secular solution, convinced that the introduction of the religious element into the heart of the school system produces no root of healing, but only an unfeeling and embittering quarrel.

AUSTRIA AS A SLAVONIC POWER.

Sixty years ago, the aged Emperor of Austria-Hungary came to his throne amid one of those storms which visit the temperate political climate of Europe but once in a century. When the year of jubilee began, a whole continent agreed to join in a chorus of eulogy and congratulation. It seemed then as if this venerable pilot had really succeeded in reaching calm waters, with a fair-way stretching far ahead. Neither a brilliant intellect nor a volcanic will, he had, none the less, shown a a singular capacity for development and adaptation, a serene and pliant wisdom which is rarest of all in extreme old age. He came to the purple a violent absolutist and the natural head of the German party of ascendency. His career seemed to be drawing to its close amid the triumph of universal suffrage and the appeasement of racial feuds, at least in Austria. He had made his peace alike with the democratic and the pacifist sentiment of Europe, and in Vienna even the party of revolution, so deeply does it respect him, had earned the nickname of "the Royal and Imperial Socialists." Routed in turn by France and Russia, rescued from the civil war in Hungary only by the arms of Russia, robbed of Venetia and Lombardy, and dependent at last on the somewhat patronising alliance of Germany, the Dual Monarchy seemed none the less to have reached in the green old age of its Emperor a position of security and popularity in Europe new in its recent annals. "Call no man happy until he is dead." A few months have sufficed to show the fatal weakness behind this illusion of strength, both at home and abroad. Baron von Aerenthal, first by his Novi-Bazar railway scheme, and then by the annexation of Bosnia, has contrived to ruin the confidence which Austria had earned for her conservative, if rather inert, diplomacy. At home the outlook is no better. The Czechs are celebrating the jubilee by bloody riots in the streets of Prague, and, not content with emphasizing their chronic domestic feuds with the Germans, they are waving British flags to symbolise their dislike of Austrian foreign policy. Even in Vienna the Italian students have been fighting their German comrades in pitched battles with revolvers. Not in Bosnia alone, but in Croatia as well, the Servian population is held down by an unusually accentuated system of coercion. In Hungary, meanwhile, the Magyars, by introducing a "fancy" franchise, which must perpetuate the political impotence of the subject Slav peoples, have pointedly declared their intention of surrendering no jot or tittle of their ancient racial supremacy. There is in Europe such a thing as Austria, which seems to be weak or strong according as her few real rulers are foolish or wise. But the lasting weakness of this Austria is that there are no Austrians. There are Slavs and Magyars and Germans, there are also Clericals and Socialists, but there is not, even under universal suffrage, the promise of a united and disciplined people, with common aims and harmonious traditions.

The Emperor's policy may have failed to establish real democracy, or to fuse the races of the two kingdoms into one people, but there has, none the less, taken place a striking, and probably decisive, shifting of the balance of power among these races. Austria is no longer the second of the German Powers; she is a competitor for the leadership of the Slavs. The monomania which leads our Imperialists to see in every untoward event that happens abroad the hand of Germany, has seriously obscured the English reading of the recent crisis in the Near East. We have seen no conclusive evidence which suggests that Germany has really inspired Baron von Aerenthal's adventures. On the contrary, it is quite probable that Germany would have preferred to attempt the almost hopeless feat of acquiring over the new régime in Turkey the same financial ascendency which she exerted over the old. She is still eager to lend money and supply cannon to Turkey, and whatever charge may fairly be levelled at her, she cannot be accused of encouraging the ambitions of Bulgaria. She has followed the Austrian lead with outward loyalty, but probably with some misgiving in her secret thoughts. The real inspiration of the new course in Austrian policy sprang, we imagine, from a series of calculations that had their origin far south of Berlin. The Pan-Germans would be glad to see an extension of Austrian rule eastwards, provided the reversion of the whole estate were ultimately assured to the German race. But among the younger men in Vienna, particularly among the Clericals and the so-called Christian-Socialists, there has lately arisen a much more interesting and ambitious conception of Austria's future. For a generation she has been struggling against the "manifest destiny" which beckoned her to become a great Slav Power. The German ascendency fought hard against numbers. But, at length, a school has arisen which sees in the whilom "Slav peril" a potential source of strength. Why should not Austria accept at last the plain facts of the situation, rally her Slav majority around her ruling class, and make a merit of the necessity which has forced her to reconcile them? That idea, once accepted, has already fructified. Russia has hitherto traded on the fact that she is not merely a Slav but an Orthodox Power. But it so happens that the most progressive Slav races are not Orthodox, but Catholic—the Poles, the Czechs, the Croats, and even the despised Slovaks, and a minority of the Bosnian Serbs. So emerges the conception of Austria as the Southern Slav Power, with the united forces of German science and the Vatican's diplomacy at her disposal. The natural leader of this new tendency is no less a person than the Heir-Apparent, the Archduke Franz Ferdinand, an ardent Clerical and a young man so far emancipated from the traditions of his caste as to have married a Czech lady. Its chief missionaries are the Jesuit priests of Bosnia, where the aim of Austrian coercion is much more to convert the Bosnian Serbs to Catholicism than to Germanise them. The movement has its attractive and kindly side. It allies itself in Austria proper with the curious but powerful party of Christian Socialism, half clerical, half demagogic, a species of Tory democracy which will do nothing for freedom but may do something for social reform. It looks askance at the race-tyranny of the Magyars in Hungary, and promises, to some at least, of their oppressed Slavs the hope of release. Its weakness as an Imperialist party is that it is doubly hated by the orthodox Serbs of Bosnia because it is at once militantly Catholic and aggressively Austrian, while to a race so advanced as the Czechs, nominally Catholic though they are, it seems reactionary and medieval. But it has, at least, a better chance than any other Austrian party of moulding the destinies of the Empire, for whatever its fate among the people, it is a growing power at Court. With this clue it is easier to understand the new direction of Austrian policy. The annexation of Bosnia was something more than a provocation to Turkey. It was a final departure from the traditions of the German bureaucracy, which had hesitated to annex because it had feared to increase the Slav preponderance in Austria. The new school dreams, on the contrary, of creating a new Slav State within the Empire, on the lines of Napoleon's kingdom of Illyria, Servian by race, but Catholic if possible, and, above all, Austrian. Into this context it becomes at length quite easy to fit the puzzling intrigue with Bulgaria. Once conceive of Austria as a Slavonic Power, and it is as natural that Bulgaria should seek her aid and act as her outpost as that she should serve as the vestibule of Russia. It is, moreover, precisely this discovery that Austria aims at leadership among the Southern Slavs which has sharpened the jealousy of Russia, quickened her neglected interest in the Serbs of Servia, and galvanised into new life the nearly forgotten Pan-Slavism of the 'seventies as a real force in the making of opinion and the shaping of diplomacy.

It seems probable that this reckless forward movement in Austria was quite prepared to advance its ends by war. It has behind it that faith in a "manifest destiny" which is among modern peoples the chief war-maker. A successful war would at least end in the humiliation of the two free Servian kingdoms, which at present keep alive the dangerous ideal of an independent Servian nationality. It would also wreck the new régime in Turkey, revive the chaos in Macedonia, and so keep open the path to Salonica where also there are Slavs to absorb. It is too early to say that this danger has even now passed. But obviously the aged Emperor has at the critical moment asserted himself against the tendencies which his Heir is supposed to lead. The Tsar has resumed personal relations with the Viennese Court, and the Turks have suppressed at least the more flagrantly provocative aspects of their boycott of Austrian imports and ships. These fortunate symptoms do, indeed, make a war less likely, but they do not bring us within sight of a Conference. Nor would a Conference which met only to seek out curious phrases of conciliation establish a permanent peace. An arrangement which put a buffer State of Servian territory across a line of Austria's advance is probably the only means by which the Balkans can really be pacified. We are in the presence of something more than a passing crisis. Germanism could have advanced in the Balkans only by buying a gate or trampling out a path. But this new Austrian idea has subtler and more persuasive forces on its side. It is, after all these centuries, a revival of the perennial struggle of Latins and Orientals for the Eastern Empire, a revival the more dangerous because it uses not religion alone, but the modern conception of race as well.

THE POLICY OF THE SUPER-TAX.

It may be taken for granted that in making provision for the large increase of revenue required to fulfil the obligations of the Government next year, Mr. Lloyd George is turning his thoughts to a further graduation of the income tax as the chief instrument. All taxation ultimately falls on income, present or deferred, for in what other way can the bulk of public income be derived than by deductions from the annual wealth which is distributed as private income? If, then, this public income can be collected directly instead of indirectly, and from those incomes which have ability to bear a tax in proportion to the extent of that ability, the best consideration will be given alike to the interests of the public revenue and to those of private industry.

It will be remembered that a Committee of the House of Commons, after a close inquiry two years ago, reported in favor of the practicability of a further and more regular extension of the policy of graduation than is contained in the system of abatements already operative in the case of incomes below £700. The graduation could be developed along one of several ways. It would be possible to increase the nominal figure of the tax and to carry up the system of abatements to a higher range of incomes. But the difficulty of joining this plan with a continuance of "collection at the source" would be very grave, for the principle of graduation is only adapted to direct personal assessment, and, if large sums collected at the source had subsequently to be returned in abatements, serious inconvenience would be caused to commerce and to individual taxpayers by a temporary locking-up of large sums of money. The weight of evidence points very strongly towards the adoption of graduation by means of a super-tax. This method is not, indeed, the simplest mode of graduation. If we were completely free from fiscal usages and were constructing ab initio a graduated income tax, the logical procedure would be to procure a personal declaration of total net income from all persons, to apply a single continuous curve of graduation beginning from the lowest assessable incomes, and to collect the whole tax from these persons, checking their return by such information as might be procurable from returns of companies or from other sources. But several considerations make this simple method inadvisable at present. In the first place it would, by abandoning collection at the source, through which more than two-thirds of the existing revenue is taken, encounter the vehement opposition of almost all official authorities, who hold that such a change would greatly increase the trouble of collection, while diminishing the yield of the tax.

Again, the sudden substitution of an entirely new mode of assessment for the old fixed tax with abatements would render all forecast of the total revenue too precarious. Finally, the dislocation of the Inland Revenue machinery by so large a change introduced in a single year would occasion great inconvenience and expense. Having regard to the desirability of applying graduation so as to produce the largest increase of revenue with the minimum of risk, we are disposed to advocate the retention of the present tax with its abatement and its differentiation up to £2,000, and to apply a systematic graduation by super-tax to incomes above that amount. The present tax would be collected as hitherto, largely at the source. A full personal declaration of income from all sources would be made compulsory upon all persons liable to taxation, and the super-tax would be collected by direct personal assessment, the income already taxed at the source being counted in for the purpose of estimating the rate of tax for each income, though the tax paid at the source would be deducted from the amount which the person was called upon to pay. We are unable to attach importance to the outcry against compulsory returns of income. The great majority of income-tax payers are already obliged to give a full return in order to procure abatement, and there is no reason why the rich alone should be exempt from a rule which, it is admitted by the unanimous Report of the Committee, "would do much to prevent the evasion and avoidance of income-tax which at present prevail." Indeed, we must go further, and insist that in order to make a graduated income-tax a safe and effective instrument of progressive revenue, it is essential for the Government to have complete knowledge of the numbers of separate personal incomes arranged along a scale of magnitude. While there is no reason to suppose that any large amount of income would be withheld from declaration, it would doubtless be desirable for the Inland Revenue to be invested with the necessary powers to test personal returns by those obtained from companies, and, we would add, by the right to demand inspection of bank accounts, if that be deemed necessary to secure proper returns of income derived from foreign sources.

No doubt it will be impossible to predict with any accuracy the yield of such a super-tax. But though there is no exact means of knowing how much income lies at various levels over £2,000, our general information as to the distribution of wealth, fortified by disclosure of estates at death, renders it certain that a very large fund of revenue lies as yet untapped. Even if we take as our index the estimate given by Sir H. Primrose for the aggregate income of persons with £5,000 a year and over (an estimate far below that of Mr. Bowley and Mr. Money), we are presented with a figure of £121,000,000. If our super-tax, graded up from £2,000, reached at £5,000 as much as four or five per cent., a fair number of millions ought to be procurable from the incomes rising from this figure. Though graduation must itself be gradual, and the earlier Budgets under such a new method are inevitably experimental, an experiment based on a conservation of the existing system for the present tax, and applied exclusively to the incomes of the well-to-do, would seem likely to prove less risky and more profitable than any other single mode of acquiring new revenue. Graduation of taxation on the upper reaches of incomes need not, indeed cannot, suffice to yield the whole of the required increase. But it must surely form the central figure in what must almost inevitably prove to be a "historical Budget."

If a super-tax, starting from £2,000, or from any other point, should be imposed, it is desirable that it should not contrive to perpetuate the clumsy mode of advancing by sudden steps reckoned in pence, but should proceed by an even, continuous rise, measured, in its application, to the several incomes by percentages. Wherever a sudden advance in rate of tax is made, an irrational discrimination occurs. This breeds a genuine sense of grievance in owners of incomes just above the limit, and causes much concealment, with a corresponding loss of yield. All this irrationality and waste are remedied by the adoption of a true graduation.

Life and Letters.

THE TUDOR BOY.

The unchanging world of childhood and boyhood reveals itself in excavation amongst a buried past. The close of the "Symposium" might stand to-day for the close of any University banquet: with the philosophy, as the night wears by, becoming confused with drowsiness and drunkenness, the desire for riot and for rest. And here in the dialogues of Juan Luis Vives ("Tudor Schoolboy Life," translated by Foster Watson: J. M. Dent & Co.), is a world of interest and desire but little different from the world of to-day; set in a Europe hurrying through a period of violence and of change, and shattered into fragments in the process. The author, humanist, educationist, friend of Erasmus and of the new learning, belongs at the beginning to a Europe which is still one land, from which the vision of a confederation under one Empire, bound together by one religion, has not yet died away. Born in Valencia in Spain, in the year of the discovery of America, of high-born Spanish ancestry, he was educated at the town school there: wandering thence into the great adventure of the Renaissance, into all the world. We find him in Paris, in Bruges, at Louvain: sometime at Lyons, where he met Erasmus: later in England, where he was offered the Readership of Modern History at Oxford, and was entrusted with the direction of the education of Princess Mary. At the Court he seems to have been poorly lodged, and at times to have experienced great weariness. "I have to take great care of my health," he writes—'tis the complaint of Court Jester or Tutor in all ages—"for if I become ill they would cast me like a mangy dog on a dung-hill." He advocated—in print—international peace and a crusade against the Turks, also State provision for the poor. He espoused the cause of Catherine against Henry, and was cast for six weeks into prison by that cheery tyrant. The "School Dialogues" (here translated) were dedicated to the little Prince Philip of Spain. "It has seemed well to dedicate it to thee, little Prince," he wrote, "both because of thy father's goodwill to me, in the highest degree, and also because I shall deserve well of my country, that is Spain, if I should help in the forming of sound morals in thy mind. For our country's health is centred in thy soundness and wisdom." It is 1536: with the English marriage, the tragedy of Don Carlos, the Armada, the building of the Escorial, and the awful scene there at the end, still in the womb of the future.

And it is a sunny world, still golden with the dawn, as we look, through a peep-hole, at the world of Tudor boyhood. Above and beyond are theological controversies of incredible bitterness, great wars which are to devastate whole populations and tear France and Germany and the Spanish Empire into pieces. But here is the schoolboy, loitering unwillingly to school, turning with zest to play, full of the quick and eager gossip of childhood, rejoicing in the singing of birds and the coming of calm weather. The dialogues commence with the child at home in the beginning of day. "Hail! my father," he says. "Hail! my mother dear. I wish that this may be a happy day for you, my little brothers. May Christ be propitious to you, my little sisters!" He plays with the little dog, making him "beg" for bread. "Isabel" gives him his breakfast in a little satchel—"a piece of bread and butter and dry figs, or pressed, not dried, grapes, as an additional dish"—and they set off for school, the place in the father's description "where animals go, to come back men." "I bring you this boy of mine," says the father to the school-master, "for you to make him a man from the beast." "This shall be my earnest endeavor," is the reply. "He shall become a man from a beast, a fruitful and good creature out of a useless one." And there comes the absorbing world of childhood. The boys torment the old women who are selling in the market place. They shirk (against the advice of a priggish companion) home work for games. They play for nuts, and when they have no nuts, play for nut shells. "Nut shells are good," says one, "for making little houses to put ants into." They play at dice—for trouser buttons, and for needles. One who has no needles deposits cherry stones instead. "Don't you give me anything for looking on?"—the question of a servant—is met by a retort as old as time: "You ought rather to give us something for having had the enjoyment of our play." Here is the Tudor cuisine revealed—no limited or austere fare for growing boys. Early breakfast is a piece of coarse bread-and-butter and fruit. For lunch there are cooked vegetables or pottage in pottage-vessels, and meat with relishes, sometimes turnips, sometimes cabbages, starch-food, wheat-meal or rice. "For elaborate feasts you must seek elsewhere, not in the school, where the aim is to form minds in the way of virtue." Tea and coffee have not yet served to fuddle the minds of a degenerate age: for drink there is fresh clear water, or light beer—some few drink, but only seldom, well-diluted wine. The afternoon meal consists of bread and almonds or nuts, dried figs and raisins; in summer, pears, apples, cherries, or plums. The boys are seen by the visitor (by permission) at their mid-day meal: themselves preparing the table, rubbing the dishes clean. One of them repudiates a knife; "I don't need one," he declares. "I can part my food into pieces by biting it with my teeth, and tear it into bits by my fingers." "They say that biting is very useful," remarks "Usher," approvingly; "both for the gums and also for the surface of the teeth." The table is cleared at the end, each boy cleaning his own knife and putting it away in its sheath. "You, there, Cinciolus," calls the master, "don't scrape your teeth with your knife, for it is injurious. Make for yourself a tooth-pick of a feather or of a thin, sharp piece of wood, and scrape gently, so as not to scar the gum or draw blood. Stand up all of you and wash your hands before thanks are returned. Move the table away, call the maid that she may sweep the floor with the broom. Let us thank Christ." "For this timely meal," says he who said grace, "we render Thee timely thanks, Lord Christ. Grant that we may for eternity render immortal thanks. Amen." And they all pass out to play.

The school boy chatter, though naïve and reckless, with a keen sense of humor, takes the reader back to a distant age before the feats of athletes and the chances of athletic renown filled all the horizon of the boy's mind. The subjects are various—the conclusion of the war with France, the song of the nightingale, premature fallings in love, Hermogenes who once bore away all the chief prizes and now has become sluggish and boorish. One story is of a countess endowed with as many children as there are days in the year; "and the numerous posterity is shown in a certain town in the island to-day." "I will rather believe this than investigate it," declares one incredulous youth. "All things are possible with God," is the reply of another, to which a third adds piously, "And, moreover, easy of accomplishment." But there is no change in the revolt of the schoolboy against early rising; and the protests of the sixteenth century dormitory might pass verbatim for the protests of every similar institution four hundred years later. There are, however, allusions in the subsequent clothing which reveal a different standard of sanitation and cleanliness. "There," cries the pleasant youth on seizing his shirt, "snatch that flea on the leap." "Leave off the hunt," he dejectedly adds. "How small a matter it would be to have killed a single flea in this chamber!"

The dialogues are admittedly written for edification. Yet they contain the very salt and flavor of the life of these vanished children, told with sympathy, by a master hand. Here is the house, the pictures on the walls, the furniture, the method of play, tennis and dice and cards; the elder students studying by night, preferring rather to work with a lamp than a candle "on account of the equable flames, which less tries the eyes, for the flicker of the wick injures the eyes, and the odor of the tallow is unpleasant." It is a more solemn world than our own, with all its jollity, a "merrie" but not a frivolous, England, in which youth from the beginning is impressed with the necessity for restraint and discipline, and the direction of energies and purposes to one all-absorbing end. It is a world, indeed, in which the "grown-up" are but just emerging from the childhood of the Middle Age, and still think that material possession and worldly gain are of less importance than obedience to the will of God. This religion of theirs appears rather as a sense of an encompassing atmosphere than as the realisation of a Presence, accepted, like food and drink, air and water, as intermingled naturally and often (to the modern mind) somewhat irreverently with the experiences of every day, and the concerns of the particular hearth and home. Yet beyond these necessary ways there was the emphasis upon a Purpose outside the little scene of competition and hot striving, the playground of children and of men. "Vives shows," says this writer, "that 'the good' does not consist in riches, honors, position, or in learning merely, but in a keen intellect, wise, mature judgment, religion, piety towards God, and in performance of duties towards one's country, one's dependents, one's parents, and in the cultivation of justice, temperance, liberality, magnanimity, equability of mind in calamity, and brave bearing in adversity." The completed product—in his own words—will be found "pleasing and dear to all." "But even this," he adds, "thou wilt not set at high value, but wilt have as sole care—to become acceptable to the Eternal God."

THE GENIUS OF GILBERT.

The reprint of "Her Majesty's Ship Pinafore" (Bell & Sons) in a prose form with pictures is presumably meant strictly for the nursery; and in such a light it is excellent, first because of the genuine excellence of the pictures, and second because there is something in Sir William Gilbert's fancy which pleases children, though it certainly was not meant for them. It is an awful rebuke for the satirist that children enjoy his work without seeing the satire. That harsh outline and emphatic color which for us makes a caricature cruel, for a child only makes it clear. Swift created "Gulliver" as a cataract of contempt for the children of men. And the children of men have drunk it delightedly and washed in it innocently ever since. Swift described his giants and pigmies in order to show how vile and vain a world it is in which everything is at the mercy of relativity. But the child reading Swift merely thinks how living and lovely a world it is, in which there are giants and pigmies at all. Much in the same way there must be many people (I am one of them) who owe their first primitive poetic impression of a modern English ship to the preposterous ship "Pinafore." I actually received the whole naval romance from this fantasia, which had no apparent object except to make game of the whole naval romance. The clean look of a deck, the smartness of the white sailors, the cocked hat and strict blue uniform of a captain, all these picturesque images I saw while sitting, as a small boy, in the pit of the theatre, long before I saw them anywhere else. As I was an English school boy, it is as needless to say that I was taught no English History during the term as to say that I was taken to the "Pinafore" during the holidays. That is the way we do things; and there may be something in it. But certainly I saw the great satire on the national navy long before I saw the national navy, or had even, in any serious sense, heard of it. I knew all the ropes and the rig of "H.M.S. Pinafore" before I had counted the masts of any craft to be seen at Margate; that caricatured and comic ship was really (in the words of its own satiric verse) the only ship I had ever seen. I knew something of the routine of sailors and the position of the quarter deck before I had seen the harbour of Portsmouth, or the spot where Nelson fell.

This is no doubt the justification of such a simplified and illustrated reproduction of the thing for children. Nevertheless it cannot be regarded as other than an inversion of the proper state of affairs. It is wrong that children should complete their own excellent common sense by staring at the mature madness of their elders. It is unreasonable that a child should never have heard of tea until he reads about the Mad Hatter's tea party. It is wrong that he should never have heard of babies until he has read "The Water Babies." Some more simple and solid picture of this earth as it is will always delight children, and ought to be prepared and preserved for them. Sense is the suitable atmosphere of children, because they never get tired of it. Nonsense is a playground for grown-up people; and I, for one, object to a lot of officious children coming and interfering with my play.

At any rate, the true genius of Gilbert is at the opposite extreme to the genius of childhood. The magic of a man like Gilbert is that he can see things just slightly crooked; the magic of a child is that he sees things startlingly and almost shockingly straight. Both bear witness to truth; but the humorist bears witness by exaggerating, the child by not exaggerating at all. I give the nearest example I have known. A little boy was sitting on my knee the other day while I was reading H. G. Wells's new book of philosophy. He could just read capital letters, and he read across the top of a chapter "What is truth?" And the moment he saw this gray and ironical riddle of old Pontius Pilate, he called out in a sudden shrill and exultant voice, "Oh that is an easy question. I know what truth is. It's saying things right." And so indeed it is; that is the best answer to the question, except the colossal silence of Christ. But the point is here, that the whole strength of the child lay not in the fact that he solved the difficulty, but that he did not admit that there was any difficulty. That is really to be close to God. But the whole point of humor in the Gilbertian sense is that it does see the difficulty, that it sees innumerable difficulties arising out of the difficulty, and that by turning the riddle back upon itself, it comes back to common sense. Compare with the boy's boisterous disdain for so simple a problem as that of truth, the treatment of the same thing in the "Mikado." Modern philosophers and psychologists (being by no means near to God) have started all sorts of fads about truthfulness; and one of them is this: that certain people (Teutons especially) are so splendidly strong and brave that truth comes out of them naturally and is part of their animal dignity and simplicity. Of course, every child knows that this is nonsense; every child (Teutonic or otherwise) knows that it is nice to tell a lie, but that by a considerable effort one can tell the truth. But the philosophers do suggest that there is a truth-telling type, a person to whom deception is instinctively painful. Gilbert, the great satirist of our subtleties, seizes hold of this particular subtlety and smashes it for ever in four ironical lines.

> "We know him well, he cannot tell
> Untrue or groundless tales,
> He always tries to utter lies
> And every time he fails."

That is the summary of the supreme inspiration of Gilbert; to take some nonsense that is said everywhere; and to say it so nonsensically that no-one can ever say it again.

In all this, Gilbert was very much the precursor and even the anticipator of Mr. Bernard Shaw. He had the power of putting a prejudice suddenly under a light in which it could not live. He performed the true purpose of a plague or a consuming fire; he burnt up everything that can be burnt. For instance, the real idea of patriotism cannot be burnt; it is incombustible and incorrupt. Whatever anyone says, it is true that Frenchmen not only live in France, but live by France. Whatever anyone says, where two or three Frenchmen are gathered together, France shall be in the midst of them. But there is an element in patriotism, especially I am afraid in English patriotism, which invites a slaughterous scientific attack. It has invited it, and it has got it. A number of young Englishmen have obviously got into their minds the extraordinary notion that the greatness of England ought to make an Englishman proud. The truth is just the reverse, the greatness of England ought to make an Englishman humble. One ought not to swagger about being the fellow citizen of Shakespeare; rather one ought to feel that Shakespeare might have had a better fellow citizen. In other words, an Englishman ought to feel unworthy of his country; it is only fools or aliens who feel worthy of it. But there does exist this false patriotism which is not so much love of England as pleasure in being an Englishman. I say it does exist; but its back has been broken with a blow. Gilbert has in one phrase defined and destroyed it In the moment when Gilbert wrote the lines

> "But in spite of all temptations
> To belong to other nations
> He remains an Englishman——" in that hour he effaced the folly of making national peculiarities a ground of spiritual pride, and killed Rudyard Kipling before he was born.

G. K. C.

THE ETERNAL JEREMIAD.

If any man among us, no matter how imbecile or vicious, could live to the age of fifty without deploring the degeneracy around him, he would deserve a prize far wealthier than the Nobel; and so would any woman. Indeed, they would receive a prize of infinitely higher value in the affectionate gratitude of every young man or maiden who enjoyed the inconceivable bliss of their society. But even a child knows the thing to be for ever impossible. Though all existence may be miraculous to a child, this is the miracle that does not happen; this is the point beyond which the virtue even of its parents cannot go. Did a father and mother live through a week and not remark upon the declining manners, endurance, and discipline of the present day, surely some heavenly aeroplane would translate them to a world better even than this world was when they were young.

When Mr. Gladstone, in remitting a tax, described sugar as the solace of old age, he had for a moment forgotten the joy of lamentation, compared to which sugar can supply but a transitory and material comfort. The ancients fabled hope as the last poor blessing left to man when the lid of Pandora's box shut down, but in that box still lurked a gift only less blessed than the visions of hope. It was the vision of memory—the ocular illusion which glorifies the past, and causes, day by day, its tedium or pain or horror to be obliterated from the mind, so that, amidst the hideousness and grief of present surroundings, all mankind looks backward to an enchanted region. For the Age of Gold has always been behind us, and only the first man and woman spent their lonely honeymoon in Paradise without remembering happier things. When we call this faculty a blessing, we do not forget that there is no greater sorrow than in misery to recall the happy time. But the pleasure that tempts increasing age appears to lie not so much in the contemplation of historic excellence as in the denunciation of modern delinquency. Denunciation of the present is the prophet's stock-in-trade, and a prophet is never young. "The age of our fathers," chant the prophets in all ages—"the age of our fathers, worse than our grandfathers, has given birth to ourselves more degenerate than they, and we, in turn, shall spawn a progeny more vicious still." From generation to generation that cry has been the prophet's delight, just as scolding a thankless child rejoices the maiden aunt.

So we need not take it too much to heart because the other day a schoolmaster in the West of England poured out the phials of wrath upon our erring race, and pointed backward to the virtues we have lost. He was but tending the homely, slighted prophet's trade, practised at every breakfast table when a parent has got out of bed wrong side:—

> "The national characteristics are passing away," he is reported to have said. "Good sense used to be regarded as one of the chief characteristics of an Englishman, but the present age is an age of feeble-mindedness. Courage and truthfulness are declining, our business faculties are not so good, and one does not meet with the modesty of other days."

'Tis the voice of the prophet: we hear him declare what from immemorial ages he has been declaring, and we envy him the luxurious pleasure in which he has sunk. Mingled with the joy of eloquent denunciation, the prophet has the further satisfaction of a benevolent self-esteem. It is all very well for prophets to include themselves once a week among the miserable sinners who have gone astray like lost sheep. We know that this is not their real attitude towards their own behavior. Else, when a boy suffers at school, why does the father invariably remark that his own sufferings at school were much greater, and assume that this is sufficient reason why his boy should suffer too? If the father had not suffered, he might have been a healthier, braver, and better man, but, miserable sinner though he confesses himself to be, that idea has never occurred to his mind. What was good enough for himself must be good enough for all, since it has resulted in excellence like his. The schoolmaster laments that we do not meet with the modesty of other days. "Things were not so in my young days," sniffs the prophetess reproachfully. And if you answered, "Ah, madam, if they had been, how much nicer you might have become!" she would feel hurt.

So there is no call for surprise when the schoolmaster takes up his parable against latter-day iniquity. Rather we envy him his self-esteem, and his bright visions of a past that never was on land or sea. But we are a little startled when, according to the report of his prophecy, he goes on to denounce the present time as "an age of misshapen lapdogs, of matinée hats, of quack medicines, quack religions, esoteric Buddhism, Christian Science, spiritualism, sentimentalism, vegetarianism, fads, and humbugs." There is something comprehensive about that. Jeremiah could not have surpassed its breadth of condemnation. It is a hotch-potch of sins. It is what the vulgar British soldier calls a basinful. How all our evil tendencies get jumbled up together—vegetarianism with carnivorous lapdogs, esoteric Buddhism with exoteric hats! It is most painful to think that all these evidences of degeneracy are sprouting around us at once. We can hardly see the wood for the trees—we mean the stage for the matinée hats—and when we have struggled past sentimentalism we come with a gasp to the vegetable course, and collapse in a plethora of contrition. There is no escape. The sins of the age are bound to get at us somewhere. If we have not yielded to Christian Science, we are sure to fall victims to Mr. Eustace Miles and nutmeat. And as to fads and humbugs—why, we have known men who thought it faddy to wear socks, and humbug to say "Thank you"! What chance has poor mankind in these degenerate times? It were simpler to confess, with an earlier Psalmist, that we are corrupt, we are altogether become abominable; there is none that doeth good; no, not one.

Of course, it is very wholesome for us, this diet of black draught, this witch's brew of lapdogs and quack religions in a cauldron. But, somehow, it seems rather a confused purgation, and one would like the prescribing prophet to discriminate a little before he makes us gulp. However misshapen a lapdog may be, however expansive a matinée hat, neither of them can be measured by the same ethical footrule as the enormity of esoteric Buddhism or a potato diet. As for sentimentalism, the word in modern controversy merely means an emotion that cannot bring in sixpence, just as the word "hysterical" usually describes an emotion that the speaker has never felt or has lost with middle-age. If our country's business faculties are declining, perhaps we may hope for less hideousness in our industrial life; if one does not meet with the modesty of other days, perhaps our social intercourse may gain in freedom and vitality. Even our great-grandfathers and the schoolmaster himself were never quite faultless, and when we hear that courage and truthfulness are declining in proportion as lapdogs and hats increase, we may remember that exactly the same lamentation was raised in all the finest ages of antiquity, whose forefathers had walked through the Red Sea, or fought at Marathon, or dug their honest fields with Sabine hoes. Even when a Homeric hero exclaimed, "We boast of being ever so much better than our fathers," old Nestor smiled superior.

Suddenly at times, hardly oftener than once in two millenniums, appears the prophet who does not cry: "Return, O my people, return!" but: "Go forward, like men. Why do you look for a new heaven and a new earth in vanished things and outworn uses, when all the time those kingdoms are within you, and their glory is still to be revealed?" At his word a new spirit is diffused among mankind, and to that voice the world listens, heedless alike of any other prophet's reproachful denunciations, and of the quack medicines, feeble-mindedness, and lapdogs which called them forth.

THE REVEALING NIGHT.

There is light behind us as we leave the house for a tramp on the hillside. It streams beyond us, and shows us in the faintly silvered grass a stroke of blackest charcoal that we know stands for a trench. We feel for the other side with a stick, and, nevertheless, the foot comes down with a jar, because, in so dim a light, it is impossible to judge distance correctly. How will it be when the light is withdrawn and the black velvet of night is all round us? Black as it seemed it proves sight-yielding. It tricks us into seeing many things that we know cannot be there—converting outlines of trees into haystacks, bushes into men, desperate footpads ready to commit murder for our purse, a newly broken log into a prone body with staring white face, a cattle byre into a ruined church of unusual beauty—yet revealing our whereabouts somewhat as through a guide speaking Greek. These outlines and broad meanings of light and shade we cannot see by day, for detail eclipses outline, and color confuses all estimate of shade. Day darkens as well as night. Night enlightens.

The things seen now, and not seen in the daytime, may seem a small thing. Not so the sharpening or extra gratification of the other senses. Is it because the eye is working at a lower focus that the scents of night are far more certain than those of day, or is it that the moisture and the velvet of night keep them in a thicker stream and purer? Surely, not only is our best smell of autumn, the nutty odor of fallen leaves, most companionable now, but we perceive, as though for the first time, that there is one smell of elm, another of the tan of oak, another of hazel, another of maple, whereas in the day we can scarcely tell the difference between larch and beech. And here, at the foot of a clay bank, is the reek of leaves fast turning to mud, and here in the grip is the trail that a fox has left in the air, and through it there comes from the orchard side the acid message of the cider they made a good month ago. The must from which they squeezed every drop of juice lies there in a heap, perhaps for winter fuel, and even three months' hence we shall get that acid smell on a favorable night, though it is not there, or passes unheeded, by day.

The soft brush of our boots on the grass, and the suck with which they leave the clay, prevent us from knowing just how silent the night is. When we stand still, it is as though a clamor had ceased, then we find ourselves listening as though for the fall of the proverbial pin. It comes in the crackling flutter of a leaf in the next tree. Then we hear the rush of the breeze that, in fact, scarcely fans the cheek, and the lift and fall of a bramble bush responding to its almost infinitesimal pressure. The roar of a railway train comes five miles, and its whistle makes as clear a streak on the silence as the hoot of a tawny owl from the wood a hundred yards away. Then out of the unheard comes the mellow common time of a horse trotting with a carriage behind it, though the wheels will for a long time be unheard. He is three miles away when we hear him drop to a walk at a slight hill, an indulgence that brings up a mental picture of the whole turn-out—low-wheeled dog-cart, fat, middle-aged horse, comfortable farmer rarely pressed for time, well-tucked behind rugs, and probably with his spouse beside him. The trotting is resumed, and after awhile, just as we almost imagine the sound of wheels, the equipage turns at the cross-roads and the sounds recede.

Though there is no moon, and the stars are blurred in the canopy of cloud, we have become quite at home in the field when we plunge into the comparative gloom of the wood. Light trickles with some freedom through the leafless boughs, but among the hollies there is the very abysm of night. As we touch their stiff skirts there is a flutter in the recess that, absurd though it be, sends the heart into the mouth. It is only a small bird disturbed in its roost. It gives a drowsy chirrup, and we cannot make certain whether it has gone up towards the stars or has put its head under the other wing and gone to sleep again. A belated fallow buck sounds his challenge not far off. It is like the rattling of antlers on branches, or the instrumental music that the great spotted woodpecker makes in spring, but there is an undoubted vocal quality that only that larynx-knotted throat can give.

We do not imagine, as once we did, that it would be easy to follow up the sound and get a view of the champion. His other senses, like ours, are sharper, and his eyesight not less keen by night than by day. He changes quarters as silently as the owl, and we soon hear his stammered cough from a point deeper in the wood. A fallen log gleams, perhaps with luminous fungus. No; there are two obvious round eyes, which waver for a moment, as though someone swung a lantern with two holes, then spring to the ground and vanish. Some cottage cat out after a wood mouse or less legitimate prey. Or, perhaps, she belongs to the charcoal burners, the incense from whose smoking mound has long floated through the wood. We expected to find the mound itself, with its writhing smoke-serpents occasionally breaking out into dull flames. But we have to confess that we have somehow lost our way in the wood. The journey is far from familiar, and even the landmarks that might be known by day are obliterated or, worse still, so it seems, altered into something else. There is a reflection of the grey sky below us on the right. It may be the eye of a pond far away, or a sheet of chalk quite near. We cannot even tell whether this at our feet is a mere path or a deep trench with mud and water in it. When we stoop and grope it seems as though the elves had suddenly changed a yawning ditch into firm ground. In a minute some other equally ludicrous problem presents itself. We creep from one perplexity to another—like a fox in the midst of traps.

Again it is some other sense than eyesight that tells us where we are. A louder throbbing than that of the pulse proclaims a motor car, and, ergo, the high road in a direction many points further to the north than we had thought. Swinging to the left we get the smell of water, and the eyes seem to feel rather than see the thinness of timber that signifies the lake. A single clue has resolved a profound mystery into clear knowledge. A spell has removed all the enchantments of the forest. A broad path comes from the underbrush where it had been hiding, and places itself under our feet, so that we march down-hill as fearlessly as in daylight. But what is that rushing, rasping sound behind us like the scales of a big serpent scraping the ground? Merely a sycamore leaf sliding and tumbling before the breeze. Surely so small a noise would be quite imperceptible except in the velvet of this dark night.

Long waves come out from the middle of the lake and stealthily fall on the shore. When a long white ripple runs in among the willow stems we think of the otter that puzzled and a little terrified Bevis and his friend in Richard Jefferies' immortal camping-out book. There are few things so mysterious and full of possibilities as a wave of which we cannot see the origin. We remember how, on such a night as this, as Jessica said, we rocked, half dreaming, in a drifting boat, heard a new ripple approaching, felt ourselves rock as something seemed to grip the gunwale, and then saw with relief the face of a friend who had fancied a swim, with our boat as the objective. Nothing comes of the ripple in the willow stems except the drowsy voice of a mallard, as though he had whispered encouragement to his startled mate. From the other end of the island, three tinny syllables call up the picture of a shelldrake's knobbed vermillion beak, for it was he undoubtedly that spoke. The naked trees, now the hollies are passed, make the rest of our woodland walk little darker than the fields. But among the yews and other evergreens in the garden the shadows are almost without a ray. Then the door, and a flood of light that in a moment blinds us, deafens us, and makes speech itself like a thing to be learned over again. So must the owl or the bat feel when suddenly plunged into the blinding darkness that we call day.

Letters from Abroad.

THE STRUGGLE FOR GERMAN FREEDOM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Prince Bülow has told the nation that the Kaiser is going to reform, and the Kaiser has made known that this promise has met with his Imperial approval. Many forces are now at work to induce the good citizens of the Empire to take note of these promises and be content. Will they succeed? This is the question of the hour.

What has been obtained in substance after all? William II.'s vagaries and indiscretions have often been obnoxious, and have provoked much dangerous friction. But they have also often carried their antidote with them. They have put people on the alert, and have thus acted as a sort of safety-valve. William has been described by those who know him very intimately as somewhat cautious, if not faint-hearted, when it comes to serious action, and the whole history of his reign confirms this opinion. He is enterprising by impulse, but shrinks from action when he realises its danger. This characteristic, not very praiseworthy in a private person, has a redeeming effect in a man at the helm of a big State. The history of William II.'s government has thus far been a history of successive retreats, not a few of them retreats from false steps. But now, if he is compelled to play the part of William the Silent, he will not change his thoughts and aspirations. Only he will not provoke the healthy opposition so often engendered by his inconsiderate harangues.

In short, the nation has won nothing. Instead of a talker, William II. will become a dissembler. Only the reactionaries who prefer to use their social power in intrigues with the Crown, profess to be satisfied with William II.'s rather piteous promises of amendment. With the great majority of the nation the feeling is quite different. True, the pusillanimity shown by William II. has had a great educative effect. It has revealed to many of those who hitherto did not care about the details of the Imperial Constitution, the absolute insufficiency of the powers of the Reichstag in regard to the policy of the Empire. The reformation of William II. concerns only questions of form and of minor importance. As king of Prussia, he has dropped his intention of dismissing Herr von Tschudi, the able director of the National Gallery of Berlin, and has paid a visit to the municipal representatives of Berlin at the centenary of the grant of municipal self-government. This was a kind of amendment, since on other occasions he has ostentatiously cut the capital town. That he does not mean to make concessions on material questions of popular rights, but only stoops in order to reconquer his former authority, has just been shown by his speech at the last-mentioned festival. This speech, read from a manuscript handed to the Kaiser by Prince Bülow—some say drafted, others revised, by Prince Bülow—speaks only of this famous legislation as if it were granted by William's ancestor, Friedrich Wilhelm III. of Prussia, out of the condescension of a mighty monarch to a submissive people. In fact, even the historical tyro in Prussia knows that the real author of that memorable Act, the enlightened statesman, Freiherr von Stein, secured the necessary signature almost by brute force from the narrow-minded Hohenzollern, and would not have succeeded if the King's armies had not been destroyed at the battles of Jena and Auerstaedt. It is equally well known that the rights conferred by that Act on the municipal bodies have since been mutilated by the successors of that King.

The desire of the nation goes in another direction. People want, if not the whole deciding power, at least a larger share in government. But how to secure it? Here lie the difficulties of the hour.

The Liberals, the Freisinnige, the Catholics of the centre, call for a law making the Chancellor and the Ministry responsible to the Reichstag, and the Social Democrats have already drafted a Bill to that effect, providing a high court to be nominated by the Reichstag, and entitled to act in case the Chancellor has failed in his duties, or has otherwise damaged the interests of the Empire. On their side the Freisinnige are now also drafting such a Bill, whilst the Centre Party have brought forward a resolution asking the "federated Governments" to bring in a Bill on the subject. These motions will be put on the agenda of December 2nd, a somewhat ominous date. The nothing-if-not-loyal parties—with the exception of the Social Democrats, of course—have agreed to leave the person of the Kaiser out of question, and this decision will, in a large degree, muzzle the Social Democratic speakers. If any of them should venture to criticise the Kaiser again, the President is sure to apply the conventional rules of the House against him.

This may provoke lively debates, but the practical result of the discussion is very doubtful. The Conservatives have already declared that they don't want any constitutional change, and the National Liberals are already diplomatising. The Government, on their part, will play the part of Brer Rabbit. They will lie still and say nothing. It has been announced semi-officially that Prince Bülow will not even be present at the meeting, but will be represented by the Home Secretary, Herr von Bethmann-Hollweg; that the latter will only be a dumb listener; and that the final attitude of the Government in regard to the decisions of the Reichstag will depend upon the composition of the majority which may have voted thereon.

What does this mean? With the Conservatives vetoing the motions, a majority composed of the parties that form the Bülow bloc is quite out of question. But if, after the rejection of their Bills, the Socialists and the Freisinnige should vote for the resolution of the Centre Party, this resolution would get a majority. According to their professed principles, the Freisinnige are bound to vote for it. But what will happen if, as must be expected, the Government declares that they will not heed a resolution carried only by the co-operation of parties that stand outside the bloc? Consistency would then force the Freisinnige to part with the bloc. But consistency is not the virtue—or vice—of that party. A more probable result is that a motion to send the Bills and the resolution of the Centre to a special committee of the Reichstag will be accepted, and the matter will be adjourned—or interred.

Altogether the preliminary discussions on this topic in the Press have already disclosed the dismal weakness of the Reichstag. The mere fact that parties, and amongst them even the Social Democrats, should get to work on a Bill setting up the legal responsibility of the Chancellor, is a sad proof of the difficulty of establishing the political responsibility of governments in Germany. I need not tell British readers what little practical value the legal responsibility of a Ministry must be, even as the Social Democratic Bill defines it, as long as the present grouping of the parties of the Reichstag remains, and how little such a law would be needed the moment a majority of the Reichstag is determined to enforce political responsibility. But such a majority is at present an impossibility. It would suppose something of an entente or truce between the Freisinnige and the Social Democrats, whilst, as a matter of fact, the antagonism between these parties is at present greater than ever.

A great opportunity is consequently going to be lost. In a qualified way the situation in Germany may be called revolutionary. Enough discontent is piled up to bring about—in any other country, at least—a radical upheaval. The callousness with which the Government's Bill on the new taxation treads on the vitals of large sections of traders in order to save the wealthy and the agrarians, has caused great exasperation; and the sentiment of the masses as regards the Kaiser and the ruling families is still very critical, if not determinedly hostile. People begin seriously to discuss the costs of maintaining so many separate princely families, with their staffs and retainers, when the Government preaches them economy and increases the cost of their living. So strong is the current that, so far as public meetings go, the crime of lèse-majesté is dead. The strongest utterances, and their passionate endorsement by the meetings, are allowed to pass unnoticed.

But all this remains—words, words, words. There is no action behind, nothing that promises a great constitutional change. After seven days' debate the new taxation Bill has been handed over to a Special Committee of the Reichstag, and all depends now upon the findings of that Committee. If the Freisinnige stick to the declarations they have made during the debates, if, along with the Socialists, they reject the unjust taxes on cigars, beer, electricity, &c., whilst the Conservatives and the Clericals reject the death duties, it is hard to see how the 500 millions of marks the Government wants can be scraped together, and a dissolution of the Reichstag will be inevitable. But a new General Election would, as quite a number of remarkable Socialist successes at recent elections have shown, result in the return of the Socialists in a greatly increased strength, and in the face of this contingency, everything will be done to bring about a compromise on this, as well as on other questions.

Instead of a concerted action of the Liberal and Democratic forces, fighting in a converging line against the central Government and its reactionary backers, we see the said parties in heated antagonism to each other. Compromise between the Freisinnige and the Conservatives may be the final result of all these agitations. Unless some unexpected incident, provoked perhaps by the Polish question, which has suddenly arisen again, changes the situation, it is greatly to be feared that the constitutional crisis in the German Empire is going to be—as the English Parliamentary term goes—"talked out."—Yours, &c.,

The Drama.

A NEW ACTRESS.

THE afternoon of Friday, November 27th, may possibly prove a memorable date in the history of the English theatre. It certainly introduced us to a new actress of remarkable qualifications; and if she fulfils the promise of this first appearance, those of us who were present at the New Theatre that afternoon may go about boasting to the end of our days that it was our good fortune to hail the rising of an unhoped-for star in the long void and darkling firmament of Tragedy. This is no prophecy, remember—or rather it is a prophecy carefully hedged behind a very large "if." All I assert is that the performance of that afternoon came much nearer to great tragic acting than anything we have seen for many a day, and could not but raise high hopes for the actress's future. For the true measure of her powers we must wait until we see her essay the queens of classic tragedy, instead of the miniature heroines of modern culture-drama. Of these exotic personages we have not—or, at any rate, I have not—any definite ideal by which to test her success. But the nobility, the beauty, the passion of her acting in these parts led one to wonder, with a little thrill of surprise, whether here might not be at last the woman who could fill in the great outlines of Lady Macbeth, of Constance, of Cleopatra.

The new actress's name is Mrs. Patrick Campbell. It is not, to be sure, a new name. It has been tolerably familiar to all playgoers any time the last fifteen years. Nevertheless, it was a new actress who made her entrance that afternoon. Hitherto we have seen in Mrs. Campbell a fascinating, irritating, and, in some ways, extraordinarily able woman, but scarcely a tragedienne, and much less one who came within measurable distance of greatness. One or two parts she has played exquisitely—parts suited to her temperament, and kept well within her gamut of emotional expression. Such a part was her never-to-be-forgotten Mrs. Tanqueray. Almost the only emotion Paula was called upon to express was a petted querulousness. She was querulous with her husband, querulous with her Creator, querulous with herself; and when deeper emotions took hold of her, such as consternation and despair, what she was required to do was not to express but to repress them. In all this Mrs. Campbell was absolutely at home; into all this she threw the irresistible charm of her personality. In other parts in which the same gifts sufficed she was equally successful; but in parts for which these gifts did not suffice she devoted herself, with extraordinary skill, to circumventing and dodging the difficulties they presented. She was far too able to give herself away by attempting what she could not do. She would simply turn aside from the great moments and opportunities of a character, leave them entirely unattempted, and trust that an audience, under the influence of her composed, masterful, enigmatic personality, would never know what they had missed. Here, however, one must qualify a little. There was a period, about the middle of her career, when it seemed that Mrs. Campbell was ambitious, not merely of existing gracefully and skilfully on the stage, but of positively learning to act—to give free expression to intense and even violent feeling. This was about the time of her season at the Royalty and her second appearance in "Magda"—to be carefully distinguished from the first. Then, for a year or so, one really felt that Mrs. Campbell was abandoning her merely safe and non-committal policy, and had made up her mind to learn her business. Before long, however, the resolution seemed to fade away, and again we found Mrs. Campbell relying on grace, adroitness, personal magnetism—on anything and everything save passion and truth. One could admire and take pleasure in many of her performances, but it was with the cold admiration extorted by cold intelligence. There was always a high level of accomplishment, never a great, white-hot moment, that burned itself indelibly on the thrilled and exalted mind.

All the greater and more agreeable was the surprise that awaited us at the New Theatre. Or rather—since the affectation of impersonality is here unfair to the artist—I will say the surprise that awaited me. I have no right to assume that my view of Mrs. Campbell's artistic history is shared by other people. Speaking for myself, then, I confess my surprise was so great as to render me a little cautious in interpreting my emotions. I may have done more than justice, or I may have done less, to Mrs. Campbell's two performances; but of one thing I am sure—namely, that her acting belonged to a different order of art from anything that she has yet shown us. She seemed to be lifted on the wings of the poetry she was uttering. One felt real imaginative exaltation, and a sincere desire for imaginative expression—a desire which often met with admirable fulfilment. Perfect freedom Mrs. Campbell has not yet obtained. There were times when she still seemed trammelled by her mannerism, times when she tried to do something that did not quite come off. But even that marked what I may call a great moral advance. There was one point in the "Electra," where an outburst of fury called forth a slight titter from some of the audience. I hope Mrs. Campbell will not think it an idle paradox if I say that that still small titter counted, in my mind, more to her artistic credit than many a conventional salvo of unthinking applause.

If I am right in my estimate of these two performances, the explanation would seem to be, in part, at any rate, that Mrs. Campbell has an imagination which requires the magic spark of poetry to kindle it to a creative glow. It may be said that this is by no means her first contact with poetry—that she has already played Juliet and Lady Macbeth. I answer that, since those days, her powers have insensibly matured, that her physical means now respond efficiently to her imagination, that her courage is higher, her artistic conviction more intense. For Juliet her technical qualifications were wholly inadequate; and Lady Macbeth, despite all the paradoxists, is a part for full maturity, not for youth. In the two characters she is now playing she brings ripened powers to simpler problems. But the determining difference, it seems to me, is a change of heart, a difference of spirit.

Mr. Yeats, in his speech at the end of "Deirdre," spoke of the lyrical beauty of Mrs. Campbell's performance. I am not an admirer of criticisms delivered from the stage; but this happened to be a just and appropriate one. The play is, as I think modern blank verse plays ought always to be, a thing of great lyric beauty. It is an attempt, and, to my mind, a very successful one, to treat the catastrophe of the exquisite legend of Deirdre—most beautiful of all folk-tales—with Greek simplicity and concision. The play is not as beautiful as the story—who could bring to the footlights its divine atmosphere of the primitive world?—but the crooning accent of the verse is a delight throughout, nor is dramatic tension ever sacrificed to lyrical (and much less to rhetorical) loquacity. There is one technical fault which Mr. Yeats might with ease amend. The silent appearance of Concubar at the door would be immensely effective if we knew from the first who he was; but, as a matter of fact, we do not—he might be any man-at-arms sent to see what was going on. Mr. Yeats should prepare us to recognise him by some distinctive mark—some plume, some jewel, or some diadem. For the rest, the prowling Lybians are an admirably imagined feature, and the whole arrangement of the catastrophe, though it implies no small credulity on the part of Concubar, is dramatic and fine. Mrs. Campbell's constitutional plaintiveness of delivery suited the lyric cadence of the play throughout; and in the final scene she rose to very real power and impressiveness. Her performance would bear elaboration; its general scheme could scarcely be improved.

Even more striking and memorable was her "Electra" in the play of that name by the Austrian poet, Hugo von Hofmannsthal. A strange play it is, and one of savage vigor and intensity. American critics, I believe, when Mrs. Campbell first presented it, complained that it lacked classic repose and elevation. The complaint showed a misunderstanding of the author's purpose, which was precisely to get behind the Attic or "classical" convention, and give us a page from the primitive saga-stuff which the Greek dramatists polished and adapted to suit the taste of their time. His inspiration is Mycenæan, not Attic. Following very different methods, he has made the same attempt which Professor Murray made in his "Andromache," produced several years ago by the Stage Society—an attempt to reconstruct in the light of anthropology the raw material of Hellenic legend. Hofmannsthal's work is grim, violent, distressing, but extraordinarily powerful. Perhaps his Clytemnestra, tottering heavily to her doom, weighed down by all the amulets and charms in which she hopes to find protection from her evil dreams, is an even more original creation than his wild-cat Electra, the incarnate spirit of unrelenting revenge. Both are magnificent acting parts; but Miss Florence Farr, unfortunately, makes the figure of the mother rather vague and colorless. Mrs. Campbell, as the daughter, scarcely carries out the author's intention. Hofmannsthal clearly imagines Electra as a lean, hectic, quivering slip of a girl; and he describes her in so many words as dressed in rags. Mrs. Campbell, on the other hand, wears a stately black robe and flowing veil, and is from first to last an unmistakable heroine of tragedy. But while she transposes the key of the character, she represents its manifold phases of fierce emotion with real originality and daring. If not so absolutely right as her Deirdre, her Electra marks still more distinctly a great development in her talent.

How far will this new departure carry her? It is impossible to say. She has strenuous work before her if she is to attain the heights to which she now seems seriously to aspire. All one can say is that it is hard to imagine her, after such performances as these, relapsing on the mannered prettinesses, the adroit evasions which have so often been her stand-by in the past.

THE CABINET AND THE SUFFRAGETTES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—At the present time the old-established policy of the Suffragettes of putting questions and protesting against the speeches of Cabinet Ministers, is receiving more than its former degree of opposition and angry censure, and many of those who condoned and even in some cases those who approved these tactics, now condemn them in the most vehement terms Among the latter, a notable case is that of Mr. Israel Zangwill, who, in a letter to "Votes for Women," states that he was the first man publicly to approve the militant tactics, and although this statement is not quite true, he certainly was among the earlier friends of this particular form of agitation.

Now the protesting against the speeches of Cabinet Ministers has logically grown out of the earlier method of putting questions, and the fact that it has done so is entirely due to the behaviour of Cabinet Ministers themselves. It was because they persistently ignored the subject of Woman Suffrage that the questions were in the first place put, although it is perfectly true that women equally with men have a constitutional right to go and question the representatives of the Government when they come forward to give an account of their stewardship to the people. We know that at the first meeting at which these questions were put—held in the Free Trade Hall on October 13th, 1905, and addressed by Sir Edward Grey—several questions put by men, even during the progress of his speech and also at its close, were readily answered by Sir Edward Grey, but that when Annie Kenney and Christabel Pankhurst got up to put their questions, absolutely no notice was taken, and that when after waiting until almost the close of the meeting, and having also sent up their question in writing to the platform, they determined to insist upon an answer, and to demand it until it was returned to them, they were rudely and violently ejected by the Liberal stewards. After the women had been thrown out of the meeting, Sir Edward Grey said that he had to admit that he was partly responsible for the disgraceful scene of violence which had occurred, but as the question of Woman Suffrage was not one which could be dealt with by the Liberal Government, he did not think it was a fitting subject to raise at that meeting, and for that reason he had declined, and still did decline, to make any statement in regard to it.

This sort of thing happened continually. If the women waited until the close of the speeches, their questions were ignored just the same, and in many cases the Cabinet Ministers hurriedly left the platform on some insufficient pretext in order to avoid the appearance of refusing to give an answer. The women were, therefore, obliged to resort to the method of asking their questions during the speech, and after many months, when it became evident that no reasonable answer was to be given to them, they also made a point of protesting not only against the withholding of an answer, but against the actual speaking of the Cabinet Minister whilst the Government refused to enfranchise the women of this country.

When the women took up this attitude, they were only following the example of the men, as is well known. Prior to the passing of the Reform Bill of 1867 we know that no politician hostile to the Reform Bill was allowed to speak, and we know that these tactics were also resorted to by the men after the Lords had thrown out the County Franchise Bill of 1884. The result of this was the speedy passage of the Bill through both Houses of Parliament on its re-introduction in the Autumn Session. The women say now, as the men said in those days, that the fact that a meeting has been called for some other purpose, and that the Minister is speaking on some other subject, is no reason for allowing him a peaceful hearing. They claim that until he has made a pronouncement that the Government will give votes to women, his remarks ought to be received with the most uncompromising hostility. The women who make these protests are frequently accused by the Liberal Press of being in league with the brewers and hostile to the Licensing Bill, to the Old Age Pensions Scheme, to the settlement of the Education question, to the Children's Bill, or to whatever measure the Cabinet Minister whom they interrupt may happen to have taken for the text of his remarks. Those of us who know our history realise the injustice of this accusation, because we know that the men in the old days actually won their vote by precisely these methods of calling attention to their grievances which the women now employ. After all, women cannot help realising that there are men who think that the Liberal measures now before Parliament are so perfect and of such paramount importance that everything else ought to be put on one side in order to facilitate their passage into law; women feel deeply that until they themselves obtain the franchise, no really satisfactory settlement of any of these important questions can be arrived at, because the women's point of view will be almost, if not entirely, overlooked. Women care for Temperance; women care for education; they are keenly interested in all questions affecting the housing of the people; indeed, there is no single reform which does not affect them as nearly as it does men, and, therefore, they are determined to secure their enfranchisement in order that they will have the constitutional power to express their opinions on all these other important questions.

But now it is a fact that many men who did not strongly object to women protesting when Cabinet Ministers are speaking upon other questions, believe their conduct to be absolutely illogical when they carry out this policy in the case of a Cabinet Minister who has taken Woman Suffrage as the subject of his remarks.

The particular case before us at the present time is that of Mr. Lloyd George, who, as we all know, is speaking on December 5th for the Women's Liberal Federation. He is speaking on Woman Suffrage, and so we are told that it would be an absolutely senseless proceeding for women to protest against anything that he may say. It is well known that members of the Women's Social and Political Union are likely to attend this meeting in order to protest against anything Mr. Lloyd George may say, and there are many people who absolutely denounce this policy, because they consider it so exceedingly kind and condescending of Mr. Lloyd George to come forward and address a women's meeting on the subject of women's enfranchisement, that all the women, in their opinion, ought to be overjoyed. Now this may probably be precisely what Mr. Lloyd George himself thinks, and it may possibly be that the Government has come to the conclusion that the time when something must be done to please members of women's Liberal associations, and to placate the hostility of other women, has arrived. They know, as we do, that there is considerable disaffection towards the Government in a very large body of Liberal women, and that many of these have joined and are subscribers to the militant anti-Government Women's Social and Political Union. The Wallasey Suffrage Society recently passed a resolution dissolving itself until women have obtained the Parliamentary franchise, and the Margate Women's Liberal Association speedily followed this example. The Chichester and District Women's Liberal Association only this week forwarded to Mr. Asquith and Mr. Herbert Gladstone a resolution passed by them, protesting against what they consider to be the unjust treatment meted out to Mrs. Pankhurst and her colleagues in prison. It was their opinion, they said, that this treatment was a scandal and a disgrace, and they desired that the Home Secretary should order the immediate removal of the Suffragettes to the first division.

This sort of thing is spreading amongst Liberal women all over the country, and the position is becoming serious in view of the next General Election. It may be, therefore, that the Cabinet has decided to send Mr. Lloyd George to the women's Albert Hall meeting in order to hold out the olive branch of peace to the women, and induce them to return to the party fold. Mr. Lloyd George and the Government are, of course, perfectly justified in doing this, but the question is, what is the peace offering? Is it to be something really genuine, or only a poor empty imitation? Is Mr. Lloyd George going to the Albert Hall to utter the usual empty platitudes? Are the women to hear from him, as they heard from the Prime Minister in 1906, merely a sympathetic and aptly-worded speech on Woman Suffrage, to conclude with the statement that the Government had nothing to offer, and can do nothing to give women the vote? Or is Mr. Lloyd George going to the Albert Hall to give some important pronouncement, and to announce to the women of the country what it is that the Government intends to do? Is he going to say that facilities for a Woman's Suffrage Bill are going to be given in the next Session? That is the question which all real friends of votes for women ought surely to ask. Platitudes and sympathy are no use to the women's movement. They have already had too much of them. What they want is a definite, serious pronouncement. Will they get it at the Albert Hall? If they really get a promise that the Government will take the necessary action, members of the Women's Social and Political Union will only join in the chorus of applause. It must surely be understood by this time that they do not oppose the Liberal Government because it is a Liberal Government, but simply because it refuses to give them the vote. Once that refusal is withdrawn, there will be no reason for, nor would they desire to show, any hostility to the Government. At this moment the Cabinet stands therefore on the eve of a crisis, and the question is: What are they sending Mr. Lloyd George to say at the Albert Hall?—Yours, &c.,

E. Sylvia Pankhurst.

MORE MESSAGES FROM MYERS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—After reading Mr. Graham's letter in your current issue, I wonder whether he saw a communication in the "Morning Post" of October 24th last, from the widow of Frederick Myers, in which she states that "after a very careful study of all the messages purporting to come" from her late husband, both she and her son "have found nothing which they can consider of the smallest evidential value."

And is Mr. Graham ignorant of the pathetic fact that Mr. Myers left behind him a sealed letter in the care of the Society for Psychical Research, the message in which was to correspond with that which he would send from the "spirit world"; and that when this purported to arrive, it did not tally with the one which he left behind?

Further, in Mr. Graham's studies in the complex workings of the human mind, has he included examination of that extraordinary case of quadruple personality exhibited by "Miss Beauchamp," as narrated by Dr. Morton Prince in his "Dissociation of a Personality" (Longmans, 1906)?

Finally, what has Mr. Graham, in his confusion of the abnormal with the "supernatural," to say in the face of the evidence of comparative morphology as to the fundamental identity of the mental apparatus in man, and, to go no lower, the higher mammals, and of the evidence from comparative psychology which shows unbroken continuity in life, so that what is actual or explicit in us, is potential or implicit in the lower animals?—Yours, &c.,

PERSONAL SERVICE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In your issue of to-day, commenting upon the appeal made by Mrs. Asquith and others for "personal service," you say: "In the ideal State, where there will be neither rich nor poor, such personal service will, we imagine, be universal." Would you explain? For surely the "personal service" intended in the appeal implies the giving of material assistance, or its equivalent, but in a less haphazard, ill-informed, and more individual manner than at present. But in your ideal State material assistance of any kind is ruled out; there are to be no poor to require it, no rich to give it. How then can personal service be universal?

Or is it meant that in the ideal State everybody is to spend his or her time dropping in upon the neighbors to give them a hand with cooking or boot-blacking, or to cheer them up by reading the newspaper?—Yours, &c.,

A READER.

November 14th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The correspondence on the above subject now going on in THE NATION is of great interest, for it touches on one of the problems of the day. "How can we best approach our poor neighbors?" is a question often asked of oneself when confronted by the sorrow, sin, and degradation we see everywhere around us; and I think the "Personal Service League" is calculated to give just that personal touch which is wanted. The poor are just like every other human being in the joys and sorrows of life, in the various relationships of husband and wife, parent and child, brother and sister. Alas! notwithstanding, there is a great gulf between the rich and the poor, for they differ and have differed from infancy in environment, and it is this gulf that, as I understand it, the League is intended to bridge. Distress Committees and organisations are doubtless necessary, but, like all public bodies, they are, perhaps necessarily so, hard and inflexible, and it is this failing that the League is intended to counteract. If we make friends of the poor, if we treat them as we treat persons in our own class, if we are a little blind to their failings, if we really feel the sympathy we express in words, the great gulf would be bridged in time. If each householder took only one family into his or her care and genuinely tried to help them, not as a Lady Bountiful, but as a fellow human being, the world would be richer, and genuine friendships would be formed, bearing good fruit and benefiting both rich and poor. —Yours, &c.,

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your various correspondents seem to have failed to appreciate the real point of Miss Davies's letter. Personal service can remedy only personal evils. But the evils in question are either the symptoms or the results of poverty, and the classes "poor" and "rich" are, under a system of hereditary property, determined neither logically nor, in fact, by personal characteristics. True, the Hon. Mrs. So-and-So possesses all the virtues, while Mrs. Smith, of Whitechapel, is a drunkard; but one was brought up on admirable principles and the other on gin. Gratitude in default of equity is, perhaps, more than the scapegoat can expect, but to say to her in effect, "The arrangement which gives you the kicks and me the halfpence is right, and shall go on, but I am willing to overlook the difference between us, and let you breathe the lustral air of my society," is to add insult to injury.

Personal service may be all that the rich will give, may even do good to individuals, but to put it forward as the true remedy for what is due to politico-economic causes is simply to drag the proverbial herring.—Yours, &c.,

MR. LONG AND SCOTTISH HOME RULE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Allow me to call attention to certain remarks made by Mr. Walter Long, M.P., in his speech in Edinburgh on Friday last under the auspices of the annual Conference of Scottish Conservatives.

Dealing with the question of Scottish Home Rule, Mr. Long asked "if Scotland was prepared to provide out of her own resources every penny she required for her own purposes. In the one case they had the credit of the United Kingdom behind them; in the other the credit of the isolated portion." By this he clearly means that Scotland has to be assisted financially by England. Now, in 1906, Mr. Pirie, M.P., pointed out at Lord Rosebery's Scots Greys meeting that "in 1905 Scotland contributed to the total revenue of the country £16,000,000. Not one quarter of that sum was spent locally." If the great Unionist Party has to fall back on misrepresentations and inaccuracies in order to oppose Scottish Home Rule their stock of arguments must be running short.

After a lot of sentimental talk about disintegrating the Empire—which in the case of Scotland is an absolutely futile argument—Mr. Long said, "If Scotland demanded Home Rule, Wales would demand it, and why not Lancashire?" Now a remark like this from an English laborer might be excused, but Mr. Long cannot plead ignorance of history and geography, and of the fact that Scotland is a separate nation from England, with different administration, laws, religion, local government, and education. What is the use of Mr. Long coming to the Scottish capital and publicly insulting the Scottish nation by a sneer at our position in the United Kingdom? Such is not the way to bring about a truly united kingdom. He ought to know that the desire for Home Rule is far from being confined to extreme Liberals, and that many Unionists, opposed to Irish Home Rule, are quite tired of the present system of discussing all Scottish affairs in London; and he certainly ought to know that few Scotsmen, either Liberal or Unionist, care to hear their native land contemptuously referred to as if it were an English province.—Yours, &c.,

"FIGHT OR ABDICATE."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Every Liberal will heartily agree with you in saying that we must fight or abdicate; that we should have commenced two years ago; that the country expects action, not speech; and that the party must at once lay its plans for vindicating its position as champion of self-government.

On the other hand, many will strongly differ when you say that it is no longer possible for the present Parliament to run its full course, and from this time onwards preparations must be made to appeal to the people. The reasons are obvious. We have just come from the people—not three years since—whereas the Lords commenced to flout their decision from the outset, and to go back would be simply asking the constituencies did they mean what they said, and are the Liberals in Parliament to defend themselves when attacked? Surely at this period in our history it cannot be an open question as to the right of the Commons to legislate. It is therefore a matter of privilege, not of elections. Mr. Gladstone did not dissolve in the early 'sixties. Let us, therefore, follow his example, and make every Bill a money Bill, henceforth and for ever, threatening the Lords with the creation of new Peers if they reject the same, and the immediate destruction of their veto. Thus, without election or legislation, their place in the Constitution will dwindle through inanition and desuetude, and they will become a factor of no importance in politics.—Yours, &c.,

H. H. ROBSON,
Hon. Sec., Waterloo Liberal Association.

Glengarriff, Mariners Road,

November 29th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your issue to-day there is an article entitled "Fight or Abdicate," and I should like to ask whether the writer is quite justified when he says Liberal members would not risk the sacrifice of place or the loss of seats in an appeal to the country (against the wrecking methods of the House of Lords) two years ago. That appeal evidently was, and as plainly is, the desire of Mr. Balfour, for all his tactics have worked to that end. The Conservatives want to push the Government into an early dissolution. Are Liberal Ministers bound to gratify them? Are they not rather called upon as stewards of their country's weal to stay in their places and keep their seats for the sake of Free Trade, of Education, of Land questions, of London Reform, and of many another pressing reform. Most of us Liberals do credit the Ministers who govern us with some real interest in measures for the good of their country apart from all personal considerations. Mr. Asquith has shown clearly enough a wealth of resource and ingenuity in regard to the legislation he has introduced, and it is quite possible some of the harm resulting from the rejection of the Licensing Bill may be retrieved financially in the next Budget, as, indeed, the writer of the article suggests himself. Also it is within the range of possibility that Mr. Asquith may find some way of getting some of the other Temperance clauses embodied in another measure through both Houses. Because there are clauses in the present Bill that many Unionists and Conservatives approve of as fully as Liberals themselves do. The cry for a General Election on account of the action of the House of Lords, shows some lack of invention of a better way of meeting the difficulty. That the brewers will get less good terms in the new Budget clauses is probable, and it is also possible that the Lords who hold brewery shares may suffer more loss than they would have done if they had passed the Bill as it is. It is also possible the Peers are realising that Mr. Balfour is a broken reed to lean upon for advice. Certainly —apart from all else—the Lords have shown neither cleverness nor subtlety in their method of rejection. And they have raised immense antagonism. But it is another argument, not for dissolution, but for the necessity, the vital necessity, of keeping this strong Liberal Government in power, and in activity, for it has immense work before it. Despite the Lords it has accomplished much, and despite the Lords it will do much more. Let us spend none of their valuable time in premature appeals, since we know that Liberal legislation and administration are the salvation of our country. Instead of advocating an early dissolution, there is a strong feeling ever growing that the Government must be kept in power to the very last possible moment of its existence. Antagonism to the House of Lords, already very deep, has entered into a permanently deeper phase of feeling, and the next General Election, when it is due, will—there is little doubt—reveal unmistakably the Liberal Party's indignation at the treatment it has received from an unrepresentative body in the legislature. Meantime we have kept our Government in power for two or three years longer, with its large majorities, in the House of Commons, to work out reforms, unassailable by the Peers.—Yours, &c.,

B. Brooksbank.

THE MATERIALISATION OF THE CHURCH

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—On Saturday evening I received the notice of a book entitled "Pastor in Parva Ecclesia," with the sub-title "A Practical Study in the Art of Money-raising." On opening the "Morning Post" to-day, I find the following: "To Bridge Players.—On the 1st December next, the birthday of our Gracious Queen, will you give one twentieth of your bridge winnings that day to assist in building an extra aisle in St. Paul's Church, Winchester?" Can we resist the lament: has Christianity come to this? In the proposed revision of the Book of Common Prayer should not the Bishop be petitioned to add to the offertory sentences some verses appropriate to Bridge winnings. Some such verses may possibly be found in the Scriptural index which the practical study in the art of money-making contains.

Is not the time ripe for a protest against institutional churches that run so many organisations that the clergy have to spend their time and energies serving tables while the people are hungering for religious teaching and being offered drum and fife bands?—Yours, &c.,

MOORE'S "LALLA ROOKH."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Absence abroad on a journey which took me as far afield as Alaska has prevented me from replying sooner to a letter which appeared in your issue of the 10th October, and which criticises some references to Moore's "Lalla Rookh" made, as Mr. Beveridge, the writer of the letter, finds, both by Lord Curzon and myself.

The point at issue is the sterility or otherwise of a small island in the Persian Gulf, now called Kishm, to the natural beauties and fertility of which the poet Moore made eloquent allusion. Before approaching this main theme, I may perhaps be permitted to point out that, in the first place, Mr. Beveridge is laboring under a misapprehension when, at the outset of his letter, he says of Lord Curzon and myself: "They do not, by the way, even quote correctly, for Moore does not speak of amber vines, but of 'Kishma's golden wine.'" If Mr. Beveridge will refer to the opening lines of what may perhaps be best described as the sixth canto of "Lalla Rookh," he will find the following passage:—

> "The morn has risen clear and calm,
> And o'er the Green Sea palely shines,
> Revealing Bahrein's groves of palm,
> And lighting Kishma's amber vines."

But to get to the real point at issue—the vegetation, or want of vegetation, on Kishm. In spite of Mr. Beveridge's surmise that I have never seen the island, unlike the poet, I have. In fact, I have landed on two portions of its somewhat limited coastline, and on both occasions scrambled for some time about its extremely unprepossessing surface. Struck by the sterility of the country, I took some rather interesting photographs, which I still have, and made some few notes upon my visit, an extract from which I venture to give here: "I have just taken a little walk along the barren coast of Kishm. I only met one man, whose conversation, as usual in the East, touched mainly upon his own wants. He wanted to see big ships fight, among other things; he wanted, also, tobacco. I could not please him as regards the first desire, but the second was more easily supplied. But for this solitary and bloodthirsty person there was little else of life that I met in my walk. True, there were oysters—small, but not at all bad—which, with the aid of a stick, I rather ineffectually grubbed off the rocks along the shore. Then also there was one hare; and never has a hare given me such a start as did this one, rising suddenly out of a yellow nothingness and disappearing into a yellow infinity. What it lived on I cannot imagine, unless it could consume sand and, as the occasional gazelles according to some are credibly asserted to do, could slake its thirst in the ripples of the sea."

So much for my own experiences. But, my curiosity being aroused by Mr. Beveridge's doubts, on searching for other authorities bearing upon this subject, I was interested and amused to find that Major Sykes, whose great knowledge of Southern Persia is well known, had independently commented upon "Lalla Rookh" and Kishm; and that, by a coincidence strange enough, to pardon (unwarranted) suspicions of plagiarism, not only in "Persia" and in "Across Persia" was Moore pilloried, but also in "Ten Thousand Miles in Persia." Here is the passage:—

> "In Moore's poem, 'Kishm's Amber Vine' seems to suggest a delightful spot, yet there are few more unhealthy corners of the world than this section of the Persian Gulf, where everything is barren squalid, and sunscorched to a degree which can only be realised by being seen" (page 290).

It only remains to remark, turning to the last part of Mr. Beveridge's letter, that the river Bendemeer ungraciously refuses to lend itself to Mr. Beveridge's scheme to justify Moore, by resolutely flowing, not through Shirax, but into Lake Niris, at least thirty miles away.

A disinclination to remain under the suspicion of having, in company with Lord Curzon, unjustly and irreverently taken a great poet to task over so serious a subject, must excuse this tardy vindication.—Yours, &c.,

E. Crawshay-Williams.

THE SPEECH OF THE PROVINCE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The writer in your issue of November 28th, is on solid ground when he explains how a dialect as a rule sounds unpleasant only when it approximates to one's own pronunciation (e.g., as the speech of the costermonger does, in the ears of a Scotchman, to that of an educated Londoner).

But in the beginning of the article there are several statements quite contrary to the science of Phonetics. In the first place, it is quite possible to pronounce both the y and the m in phlegm without any vowel between them. The formation of a syllable by a "sonant" consonant, without any vowel whatever, is not uncommon in some languages, and even in our own dialects. I, an Irishman, often say brokn in two syllables for broken, many Germans say Habm Sie for Haben Sie, and some interjections in English have no vowel at all. In the next place, the sound at the beginning of the word "what" (as pronounced by Northerners) is a single consonantal sound, a "breathed" w, having the same relation to w as s has to z. It is thus quite as correctly written wh as hw, although our Anglo-Saxon ancestors preferred to write the word hwæt. It seems unfortunate for the permanence and solidarity of our language that, in the different parts of the country, phonetic development (or decay) should go in such different directions. Thus, while in Scotch the l's tend to disappear (ca' for call, a' for all, &c.), in Southern speech the final r's have gone, and the initial h's are going; a Londoner, even when educated, appears to prefer to say "an harmonium," "an heretical opinion." But it is practically impossible to control these diversifying and disintegrating tendencies as long as our irregular spelling gives no reasonable indication of what the pronunciation shall be.—Yours, &c.,

SIR,—Having "received the first palpable hit" from the Cockney in the pronunciation of "w'ot," "w'ich," "w'en," "w'ere," I surrender my sword. But, please, am I to say for the future "woo" and "wole," or "oo" and "ole"? My friends seem equally distressed at either.—Yours, &c.,

THE SMALL HOLDINGS ACT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Everyone interested in the Small Holdings Act will be glad to see Mr. Phillip Morrell's article in your last week's issue. One can only regret that it comes so late; six months ago his remedies might have been effective.

But in the last six months, in many districts at any rate, a new element has been introduced—for all confidence has been destroyed both in the administrators of county councils and even of the Board itself. In this neighborhood the recent Land Club deputation did much to strengthen this feeling of distrust. On this occasion twenty men and women, who represented 170 applicants for 1,250 acres, none of whose applications had been dealt with, attended before Lord Carrington. For an hour we explained to the President our grievances, taking him from village to village, and telling him what had occurred; we made it clear that the Act had been seriously mal-administered. He frankly admitted the grievances; he promised inquiry; he spoke generally of putting things right; but he had no specific remedy to suggest. On the other hand, the specific request of our president for the administration of the law in accordance with the provisions of the first three sections of the Act are not granted. As Mr. Morrell points out the law is to be ignored. However much we were charmed by Lord Carrington, no one had any doubt about the unsympathetic attitude of the officials. It is thus that confidence is destroyed. But this is not all. The condition of the public mind is well illustrated by the extraordinary stories freely circulated about the administrators of the Act. These stories come just as much from the opponents as from the supporters of small holdings, from the farmers as from the men. Of course, they are not always true, but I am confident that they are often well-founded.

The men have their own way of dealing with these matters. I will tell you a story in the words of an applicant. It is not only well founded—it is true:—

> "Two men have been down our way from the Board about the land. One came down by train and took a trap straight to the farmer's: he had something with him, and they passed the time together, walking and driving about: the chaps there wanted a bit of the farmer's land: he had enough and to spare, and did not farm it properly. The man from London saw only one laborer, who wanted land (there were over twenty others in the parish). This man's wife had had a scrap with the farmer's wife, because she would not do her washing cheap enough—anyway, he would not speak with the farmer standing by. So the official went back to the station—the farmer keeping an eye on him all the time. No one is to have any land in that parish."
> "Another man came down to a village near by: we had heard something about him: so when we knew he was coming, one of our applicants was hanging about the station for him. He took him to the farm we wanted: we kept round him all day, we took him to an inn kept by one of our lot, one of us stood outside whilst he had his dinner: then we got a trap from the inn and drove him down to the station. He's a gentleman, though against the Act, and we put the thing straight to him: we are to get the land, though we don't know when."

"There's a lot of 'doggery' about this business," my informant added musingly.

Now what can be done? Mr. Morrell's reforms are, of course, essential, but nothing, I fear, will persuade the Board of Agriculture to grant them. Moreover, the present officials, however admirable, are not specially suited for the particular work of administering this Act.

Officials with administrative capacity, sympathetic to the Act, and competent to administer it must be appointed. It is useless to talk about more inspectors; we want more commissioners; persons of progressive views with authority, who will restore confidence; one for every county. They must be supported by the Board, who must make up their mind to a progressive policy.—Yours, &c.,

THE CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPÆDIA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The statement made recently in the Press to the effect that an article or articles in the "Catholic Encyclopædia" have been condemned by the Roman authorities, is absolutely without warrant or basis.

The widespread publicity of this statement has given much annoyance to the editors of the encyclopædia, and as the publishers of the work in this country, we desire to state most emphatically that this rumor is entirely without foundation.

There is no truth whatever in the statement that any article published in the "Catholic Encyclopædia" has been condemned in any way by the authorities at Rome. So far from this being true, the "Catholic Encyclopædia" has received the approbation of the Pope himself, of Cardinal Merry del Val, and of other high ecclesiastical authorities in Rome.—Yours, &c.,

HABITUAL CRIMINALS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I be permitted to say that I, for one, do not agree with your criticisms from time to time of Mr. Gladstone's proposals for dealing with confirmed criminals? Our present system is humanitarianism run mad. We see reported week by week cases of men whose life is one prolonged course of crime. Addicted as they are to personal violence, robbery, or other forms of vice, it can be predicted with certainty that, no sooner are they released from prison, than they will at once resume their old courses. Our present plan is to let them go free, prey on society, and, after a shorter or longer run, at great expense, recapture them, prosecute them, and again confine them for a while, to go through the same round as soon as they regain their liberty.

Folly is not a strong enough word to express the continuance of this system. The people described are afflicted with insanity. Why should they be allowed to be at large, to the risk and loss of well-conducted people, more than the other dangerous lunatics who are kept under supervision in proper retreats?

We are indebted to Mr. Gladstone for his endeavors to provide a better way. Kindly note, I freely admit there is still much to be done to prevent boys and men degenerating into a course of crime, and to rescue all who are capable of redemption; but that is another story. My remarks apply to the treatment of confirmed criminals.—Yours, &c.,

WOMEN'S WAGES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I should be interested to know on what grounds Mr. H. W. Nevinson makes the statement (The Nation, p. 306), that "men's wages have steadily risen since the Reform Act of 1884, while women's have declined." I do not doubt the truth of the first clause, but I know of a great deal of evidence against and very little for the second, if it is intended to be general.

A most convenient summary of the wages of women in the nineteenth century is to be found in Appendix A (by Mr. G. H. Wood) of "A History of Factory Legislation (B. L. Hutchins & A. Harrison, 1903); there the evidence is against Mr. Nevinson. He may, however, base his statement on narrow grounds, and have access to special recent information for scattered trades. Surely he does not include the textile industries and domestic service in his statement.—Yours, &c.,

THE PROPERTIED VOTE FOR WOMEN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Your correspondents in this week's Nation all make use of figures which, it has been repeatedly pointed out, will not bear the construction put upon them. The inquiries made by the I.L.P. and others were made on the basis of the local franchises, which either do not admit married women, or expressly debar husbands and wives from both qualifying on the £10 franchise. Mr. Stanger's Bill has no such disqualifications Therefore all men living in houses of £20 rental and upwards would have the power to thus enfranchise their wives. This is a distinctly propertied franchise, only open to the well-to-do, and it is impossible to say what proportion there would be of such women in the new electorate.

The chief objection to the method of enfranchisement supported by the Suffrage societies is that married working-women, who form the largest class of women and whom legislation more and more concerns, are left out.

Your correspondent, Mrs. Martin, has not realised that Mr. Dickinson's Suffrage Bill (No. 2) made a special provision to include this class, without introducing adult suffrage.

Liberals may pluck up courage. It is not necessary that women's suffrage should be associated with an increase of the propertied vote.—Yours, &c.,

Lilian Harris.

THE USE OF VIOLENCE IN POLITICS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Those who defend "militant tactics" often say that they are only advocating methods which men have found successful. Even Mr. Nevinson, in his letter in your current issue, implies, if I do not mistake him, that the rick-burning of 1830 and the riots of 1831 at Bristol, Nottingham, and Leeds were conducive to the passing of the great Reform Bill. An attentive reader of history will come to an opposite conclusion. The excitement in the country was intense, especially after the rejection of the second Bill by the House of Lords in October, 1831; but the rioters and incendiaries did nothing but bring discredit on the cause, and it is certain that the great body of reformers had nothing whatever to do with them. At Bristol, says Harriet Martineau, the greater number of the rioters were believed to be under twenty years of age, and some were mere children. The fact is that nothing is more remarkable in the history of the time than the way in which violent methods were avoided and constitutional agitation, even by the unrepresented, was successful. Hundreds of thousands of men were organised into "Political Unions." It took more than a year of struggle before the victory was won, but it was only during eleven days that there was any real danger of widespread violence. That was in May, 1832, when, the third Bill having been rejected (in Committee) by the House of Lords, the King accepted the resignation of Earl Grey, although he had a large majority in the House of Commons, and made overtures to the Duke of Wellington. A coup d'état on his part, such as seemed possible, would have produced, not a riot, but an insurrection. How that danger was avoided may best be read in Graham Wallas's "Life of Place." The result was that the Reform Act of 1832 remains the best example in history of a revolution carried out by strictly constitutional methods.—Yours, &c.,

WHAT IS A POOR MAN?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—While no one rejoices more than I do to see The Nation steadily maintaining its high standard of interest, there seems to me to be one curious assumption gaining ground in it.

I allude to what I submit is a too constant assumption that "the poor" must necessarily be the "horny-handed sons of toil," and by no means possibly people of sound education and brain power. I am sure it is too often forgotten how widely spread is the poverty among men in the best sense of the word gentlemen, men for whom bad times mean often unspeakable trouble, and for whom no unemployment and aid societies are likely to be appealed to.

What I fear most, however, from this non-recognition of a large section of the poorer classes is that it may facilitate that sort of increasing taxation which falls on those who have to pay their rent out of a very narrow income.

I know of one man whose earnings for the last five years have not averaged more than 25s. a week. He has been able by happy chance to get a tiny central business place and a little house, free from excess of noise and signs of squalor, for 11s. 6d., with no need for travelling expenses. But the local authorities assume that he is therefore able to pay 4s. a week for rates. A more barbarous and callously cruel assumption it is hard to think of as coming from reasonably intelligent government. May I not well ask if poor men are to be "bled" when they just keep clear of the worst slums? Are rates to be paid before food or clothing and much before any sort of provision for workless days? Indeed, is no minimum income ever to be safe from the grasp of Bumbledom?

I am looking out for Mr. Lloyd George's definition of "a poor man," and for Mr. John Burns's definition of municipal recklessness in rating.—Yours, &c.,

CREED.

Blue sky, grey stones, and the far sea,
The lark's song trilling over me;
Grey stones, blue sky, and the green weed—
You have no sense that I can read;
Nor on the wind's breath passing by
Comes any meaning melody.
Blue sky, grey stones, and the far sea,
Lark's song, green weed, wind melody—
You are! That is enough for me!

THURSDAY NIGHT.

M. FRÉDÉRIC LOLIÉE, whose biography of the Empress Eugénie appeared a few weeks ago, has written a life of the Duc de Morny, which will be published early next Spring. The Duc de Morny, the son of Queen Hortense and the Count de Flahault, and thus half-brother to Napoleon III., was precisely the kind of figure, in character, morals and intellect, which suited his master and his master's ways. Readers of fiction will remember the slight and cynical, not untruthful pictures of him in Daudet's "Le Nabab." M. Loliée's work, which is based upon family letters and secret archives, promises to give some fresh information about the inner history of the Second Empire. An English translation will be published by Mr. Eveleigh Nash.

THERE is some dispute regarding the origin of Friedrich Halm's poem "Mein Herz, ich will dich fragen," a translation of which appeared in the last issue of the THE NATION. The first two stanzas are to be found in Halm's romantic drama "The Son of the Wilderness," the remainder of the poem, having been written a few years later. But a French version of the poem by an anonymous writer is given in M. Gustave Masson's "La Lyre Française."

Dis moi, mon cœur, mon cœur de flammes,
Qu'est ce qu'amour, ce mot charmant?
—C'est une pensée et deux âmes,
Deux cœurs qui n'ont qu'un battement.

Dis d'où vient qu'amour nous visite?
—L'amour est là—car il est là!
Dis d'où vient donc qu'amour nous quitte?
—Ce n'est pas l'amour, s'il s'en va!

Dis quel est l'amour véritable?
—Celui qui respire en autrui.
Et l'amour le plus indomptable?
—Celui qui fait le moins de bruit!

Comment accroit-il sa richesse?
—C'est en donnant à chaque pas.
Et comment parle son ivresse?
—L'amour aime—et ne parle pas. . .

The question is whether the French writer translated from Halm or Halm from the French writer, or whether both have made use of the same original. We should be glad to hear from any readers who can throw any light upon the problem.

THE author of "Confessio Medici"—it is an open secret that he is Dr. Stephen Paget—has written a book on mental healing, which will be published immediately by Messrs. Macmillan under the title "Faith and Works of Christian Science." Besides a general discussion of the subject, the book will contain a critical examination of two hundred cases reported as cured by Christian Science methods.

ONE of the most promising of the books held over until the New Year is Prince Kropotkin's "The Great Revolution of 1789-1793." The book has been on Mr. Heinemann's list for a long time, but we learn that it will be issued in the early spring. Prince Kropotkin's study of the French Revolution aims at presenting the movement of the people rather than the doings of the more prominent and picturesque figures. This aspect of the upheaval has, in his view, not been properly appreciated by former historians. No man is better able to deal with his subject, for Prince Kropotkin is not only a most delightful writer, but a close student of life, and a scholar of rare attainment.

SINCE Renan's death his literary executors have given to the world several posthumous volumes, which not only help us to a better understanding of the great critic's methods and temperament, but have also added something to his reputation as a man of letters. The latest to appear shows Renan in the unexpected character of a novelist. "Patrice," which Messrs. Calmann-Lévy have just published, is in form a series of letters exchanged between Patrice and Cécile, a young girl with whom he is in love. It was written in 1849, while Renan was at Rome on a mission for the Minister of Public Instruction. This visit exercised a great influence on Renan's mind, and, as many passages in the letters of Patrice are to be found in those actually sent by Renan to some of his friends, we may assume that the work is, to a very large extent, autobiographical. Patrice goes to Rome a free-thinker. But the charm of the city conquers him, and his passion is to become a Christian without having to accept Christian dogma and tradition. "N'y aurait-il pas moyen," he exclaims, "d'être catholique sans croire au catholicisme? Car d'une part, j'ai envie de pouvoir m'appeler catholique, et d'autre part, il m'est absoluement impossible de croire en bloc tout le catholicisme." He would gladly mount the Scala Santa on his knees if by doing so he might dispense with affirming that the early chapters of Genesis are true, that the Book of Daniel is authentic, and that the facts recorded in the Gospels really happened. This attitude of a desire not to isolate himself from the society around him and from the creed of his fathers, combined with an utter impossibility of accepting its formulas, is finely rendered in the letters. The book has the charm of style inseparable from Renan, but its substance appears in the "Lettres à Berthelot" and "Lettres à Henriette."

NEXT month Mr. T. N. Foulis will publish the lectures on Nietzsche's philosophy which Mr. A. M. Ludovici is at present delivering at University College. The title of the book is "Who is the Master of the World?" and Dr. Oscar Levy will contribute an introduction.

THE Literary Agency of London informs us that Mr. Andrew Lang, Mr. W. L. Courtney, and Mr. Clement Shorter, the judges in the Two Hundred and Fifty Guinea Prize Novel Competition, have awarded the prize to the author of a novel called "The Faith of His Fathers." The story deals with a group of characters in a provincial town, and is said to be an effective example of realistic fiction. It will be published early in January by Mr. Andrew Melrose.

THE CHURCH AND THE REFORMATION.*

Apart from his life-long work on the monumental "Letters and Papers of Henry VIII.," and perhaps his edition of the "Paston Letters," these two volumes represent Dr. Gairdner's most substantial contribution to historical learning, and they deal with a subject on which he possesses unrivalled knowledge. The arbitrary and more or less irrational division of history into medieval and modern at the close of the fifteenth century has sadly hampered the scientific study of the Reformation; the medievalist stops just where his scholarship would be most useful in elucidating the development of modern politics, and the modern historian does not begin his investigations until the forces he seeks to describe have almost matured. The Reformation has thus been studied with too little reference to its origins; it has been regarded as beginning with Luther's action in 1517, just as the discovery of America by Columbus in 1492 has been treated without reference to the previous developments of which it was the natural and more or less inevitable corollary. Dr. Gairdner is well protected against such irrational errors; he is almost as familiar with the fifteenth as with the sixteenth century. He knows that the Reformation could only have proceeded from predisposing causes, and that those causes must be sought in the previous centuries; and this book is primarily an examination of the extent to which the Reformation is the continuation of the work of Wycliffe and his followers.

With what seem to us to be Dr. Gairdner's main conclusions, and with many of his incidental views, we find ourselves in substantial agreement. He is too much of a scholar to commit himself to the contention, upheld by so many ecclesiastics with an ignorance and a conviction which are impervious to historical evidence, that the papal jurisdiction was unpopular throughout the Middle Ages, that the Church of England was practically independent, and that—in Maitland's satirical words—it was Protestant before the Reformation and Catholic after it. The struggles which even Stubbs regarded as conflicts between the English Church and the Papacy, are here correctly represented as struggles between State and Church, in which the Church in England sided with the Papacy, and such national independence as was achieved was asserted by the State in opposition to the English Church, although here, as throughout the book, Dr. Gairdner regards the State as nothing but the King and Government. Yet it was the barons rather than the King who refused, in 1236, to assimilate English law to canon law, and Parliament had at least as much to do as the Crown with the statutes of Provisors and Praemunire.

Equally sound is Dr. Gairdner's verdict that "Henry VIII.'s reformation of the Church was precisely on Lollard lines" (ii., 478). Here, however, he is only speaking of the methods by which the Reformation was effected—i.e., by the assertion of the supremacy of the State over the Church. Elsewhere he insists, not without considerable justification, that Lollardy has more affinity with Puritanism, and even with more extreme movements, such as Anabaptism, than with the doctrinal changes advocated by the English reformers of the sixteenth century, and incorporated in the Anglican settlement. Wycliffe was not a bishop, and had little taste for compromise. The point he has in common alike with Henry VIII. and nearly all the sixteenth century English reformers is his contention that only by State intervention could the Church be reformed. Dr. Gairdner heartily detests the method, but is inclined to acquiesce in the result.

> "The Royal supremacy," he writes (ii., 469), "though brutally enforced by Henry VIII., was, nevertheless, a true principle, and remains with us still. It has other enemies besides the votaries of Rome; but all their enmity is in vain. The principle of an Established Church, however at variance with theories which pious minds are too easily led to entertain, is one which, when once laid down, can never be set aside."

Here Dr. Gairdner is confusing two distinct things. By the royal supremacy he means the indivisible sovereignty of the State; that is the true principle which Henry VIII. asserted, and which, as Dr. Gairdner remarks, remains with us still. But an Established Church is a different thing altogether, and Dr. Gairdner's assertion that this second principle, "when once laid down, can never be set aside," will sound strange to those familiar with the relations of Church and State in the British Colonies, the United States, and France. Dr. Gairdner himself cites Ireland, but says that "what we call in these days Disestablishment in really Establishment over again." This is really making confusion worse confounded; all he means is that the Church in Ireland, being a corporation, has certain necessary relations with the State. If that means "Establishment," then every corporation is an "establishment," and every ecclesiastical corporation is an "Established Church." And if "Disestablishment is really Establishment over again," why resist it? The fact is that Dr. Gairdner holds to certain theological and ecclesiastico-political propositions very strongly, conscientiously, and rigidly; and his conscious or unconscious efforts to square the facts of history with these dogmatic propositions color these volumes throughout, and result in some very curious contentions. "It is not in the power of tyranny to deflect the rays of divine truth; and no community or nation that had really parted company with vital Christianity could hope to maintain its place in a progressive civilisation . . . the fabric of sound dogma cannot be overthrown or mutilated . . . the things which abide in religion must be true" (ii. 467-8). What religion? Buddhism or Islam? Things have had abode in those religions almost as long as in Christianity, and shown less signs of dissolution. In a sense, of course, there are abiding elements of truth in all those religions, but we doubt if that is what Dr. Gairdner means by "the fabric of sound dogma." And as to the "power of tyranny to deflect the rays of divine truth," how does Dr. Gairdner account for the extirpation of Christianity in the vast realms conquered by Islam, and for its suppression during the French Revolution? Were not those tyrannies, or were not the forms of Christianity they suppressed, "rays of divine truth"? Dr. Gairdner's remark may be excellent as a pious hope, but a statement less historical it is difficult to conceive.

The same difficulty hampers Dr. Gairdner's treatment of Henry VIII., and his extirpation of the Pope's authority. "Surely," he exclaims (i.. 305), "we are not called upon to justify the means, but only to acknowledge the fact. If a man is murdered we do not approve of the act, but we must fill up his appointments and supply his place." The analogy is not very happy; if we could, we would revive the murdered man, but Dr. Gairdner does not wish to revive Papal jurisdiction in England. He is glad the man is dead, but regrets that he was killed, or rather laments that the revolution was not made with rose-water, and denounces at great length the methods by which it was effected. We can all of us share in that lament, and some of us would go a good deal further than Dr. Gairdner in lamenting the methods, which were not those of rose-water, taken to bolster up a system the removal of which Dr. Gairdner thinks was necessary and inevitable.

The subserviency of Parliament is Dr. Gairdner's explanation of Henry's success. This is asserted very often and very dogmatically, but of evidence to support it there is practically nothing. Dr. Gairdner, indeed, quotes in support one document (i., 298), a list of "articles condescended and agreed by the King's Highness and the noblemen . . . to be enacted by authority of the same Parliament in the next full Court thereof." But there is the usual hiatus between the premises and the conclusion, which we give in Dr. Gairdner's own words, "The Commons actually refused their assent to them in that 'full Court' for which they were prepared. So, in fact, the Commons were not so subservient in this particular matter as they were expected to be." Yet "this particular matter" is the only one cited to support the generalisation. Again (ii., 81), Dr. Gairdner speaks of "a House composed, as we have seen, completely of dependents of the Court." This refers apparently to a passage quoted (i., 440) from a French martyrology of Fisher, written in the next generation! It is a pity Dr. Gairdner does not treat such authorities in the same critical spirit as he does the martyrology of Foxe. The same assertion of the subserviency and packing of Parliament is made with respect to the Parliament of 1559, and its value may be gauged from the minute examination of the evidence in the "English Historical Review" for July and October, 1908. The theory has, in fact, been exploded as completely as that of the pre-Reformation independence of the Church; but both will continue to be asserted from motives which are anything rather than historical.

A. F. Pollard.

A NEO-PLATONIC DIALOGUE.*

Plato wrote dialogues in such perfection as almost to ban that form of literary art. No modern can attempt it without challenging a comparison, and to few is it given to emerge without ridicule. In our own time Mr. Lowes Dickinson is the only writer of skill sufficient to face the ordeal, and force on the reader the conviction that the dialogue form has for once justified itself. To Mr. Dickinson's mental attitude the form is, in fact, well adapted. In the discussion of Socialism, which is the real subject of his dialogue on "Justice and Liberty," it enables him to state pros and cons with equal force, and preserve the open mind and the sense of practical difficulty, while making in the end a clear and incisive impression on the reader. The "Socrates" of the dialogue is Martin, a professor, who describes himself as "at best a perplexed inquirer socialistically inclined." His interlocutors are Harington, who maintains a rather shadowy and academy version of a Platonic aristocracy, and Stuart, who is the real critic, being a Scottish banker and a clear-headed Philistine. Harington tends to drop out of the dialogue, and might, in fact, have been dispensed with. Probably Mr. Dickinson wishes to suggest that the only possible alternatives to the mingled anarchy and tyranny of existing social life are, on the one hand, a form of industrial democracy, or, on the other hand, a true aristocracy of merit. In the presentment of aristocracy, however, emphasis is laid throughout on the Platonic division of functions and classes. We should have said that the contemporary basis of aristocratic theory—by no means a contemptible force in the modern world—rests rather on a certain interpretation of the biological view of evolution. It is in the conception that the race progresses by the survival of the fittest, and that this is to be secured by the elimination of the unfit; it is in the doctrine that heredity counts for so much that its force should be recognised and expressed in constitutions; it is in the view that men being unequal in fact should be unequal in privileges that contemporary theories of aristocracy have whatever logical strength they can boast. It is in this form that we should have liked to see the theory of aristocracy presented and confuted with all Mr. Dickinson's highly adequate delicacy and skill.

But this is a minor blemish. When we turn to the main body of the argument we recognise from first to last that we are dealing with real arguments and living thoughts. The capable Philistine, Stuart, states the case for the world which has made him a prosperous banker, precisely as such a banker would state it, or rather would like to state it, if he could always command his temper and conceal his impatience in dealing with a Socialistic visionary. Occasionally Stuart blunders, but he blunders in character—for example, when he defines liberty as "freedom from governmental regulation."

> "Martin: You are an anarchist, then?
> "Stuart: Do I look like one?
> "Martin: Not at all, I confess. You look like a man who believes in property and the police. . . . . Just imagine, to illustrate my point, the sudden dissolution of Government, so that our rich men and captains of industry could no longer call upon the public force to protect their persons and property. . . . I seem to see Mr. Carnegie and Mr. Pierpont Morgan and Lord Rothschild and other great men on the run, puffy, exhausted, mad with terror, having suddenly discovered that they have no personal force or capacity to secure anything that they have got," &c.

In face of the exposure Stuart keeps his temper, and reconstructs his position by restricting governmental interference to the minimum necessary for securing private property. An ingenious bit of dialectic ensues. He justifies private property as a stimulus to industry, and then is readily persuaded to admit that the stimulus ought to be applicable to all, and not merely to a privileged class. Martin, whose underlying polemic is directed more against inheritance than against any other single feature of our system, at once claims him as a democrat and believer in some kind of equity, and succeeds in fathering on him, only half against his will, a form of society in which the public is ultimate owner of all land and capital, though the management is left to individuals, who conduct it for their own profit subject to its reversion on their death to the community. This is not precisely Martin's ideal, which rather involves the collective regulation of industry, but is left as a more practicable alternative—a concession both to the practical man and to the objections which Martin feels as strongly as anyone to authoritarian control. Be in earnest with your talk of liberty and the stimulus to property, says Martin in effect to the contemporary individualist, and you must at least admit that our society, with its mechanism of inheritance, its consequent class divisions, its virtual denial of equality of opportunity, its practical despotism in the assignment of the poorest pay to the least agreeable and most unhealthy or montonous tasks, is a monstrous perversion of all the ideals which you paint so fair. If property is really so vital an element in human welfare, what are we to say of a social state in which the vast majority are destitute of any property worthy the name? If liberty is the ideal, what are we to think of a system in which a handful of leisured men and women owe their opportunities to the unremitting and unlovely toil of millions to whom nominal freedom is in reality the choice between drudgery and the workhouse?

We cannot here even run through the points which are touched with a delicate and often a masterly hand. We would only say one word on the broad case for the validity of the ideal which occupies the later part of the dialogue. We should have to go far to find a finer or stronger statement at once of the difficulties of idealism and of its true import. The tyranny of the brutal fact is first emphasised with all the force at the writer's command, and just as the darkness of the picture is complete the light is thrown into it. The evolution theory is turned to its true account, as can be done only when it is viewed not from the side of organic process, but from the side of mind and the historic development of social order. "History, on one side the record of man's entanglement in matter, on the other is the epic of his self-deliverance." "Those who look closer and with more genial vision find that in the midst of evil and squalor there is also something else, working obscurely and leavening the while, an impulse of love, however brief, a stress of duty, however circumscribed; that a sap is flowing through wood that seems so dead, and that the faint and flickering lamp of the ideal is lit from fire that burns at the heart of the world. That fire kindles history . . . it is the never satisfied; and one of its names is Justice." This is the poetic utterance of the fundamental truth to which the philosophy of evolution points, the infinitely slow but not uncertain emergence of mind as the master force in the world of brute fact and brutal impulse.

THE EARL AND THE CHINAMAN.*

"The Grand Tour" of to-day covers not only the Continent of India, but brings the pilgrim into districts once associated with the names of Marco Polo and Abbé Huc. Such an extension of the old-fashioned programme yields material for the study of problems which had scarcely become vital a generation ago, and offers to the young politician of noble birth and high aspirations the finest possible education. These two volumes from the pen of the Earl of Ronaldshay, abundantly adorned also with the products of his camera, deserve careful reading, for they contain shrewd and close observation, valuable commercial statistics, essays on topics of inter-Continental magnitude and interest, and much raw material for the prophecies of the near future. The first volume consists chiefly of travel notes, and the second of chapters on railway projects within the eighteen provinces

The study of natural history, and especially of bird life, is now the healthy hobby and pastime of many amongst young and old alike. Mr. Boraston writes for the beginner, in order to lend assistance, even to the merest novice, in the identification of birds, from their most obvious characteristics, broad distinctions of colour and markings, gestures, and notes. The birds are therefore shown here as they present themselves to the eye of the beholder, and their scientific grouping is given in a list at the end. Plain, non-scientific terms have been used to describe them, and there are and beyond, the rapid march of Japanese commerce and industry, and a tepid apology for the policy recently pursued by our Far Eastern ally in Manchuria and Korea. The country traversed has already become familiar to us in the pages of Blakiston, Cooper, Gill, Colquhoun, Mrs. Bishop, Archibald Little, and many missionary pioneers. When travelling overland our author had his share of risks and discomforts, lodged in unspeakable Chinese inns, met difficulties with tact and good temper, and deserves a higher rôle than that of the amateur explorer. It was perhaps not altogether a disadvantage that some of the information gathered had to filter itself through the uncouth "pidgin English" of the Chinese servant "Joe." The traveller's ignorance of the language and inner mind of the people through whose midst he passed was a disadvantage, but by no means fatal to the value of his work. An impressionist picture of a country can perhaps best be produced by the man who is shut up to the use of his eyes, and who is quick to fix upon features in landscape and native habits to which an old resident has become so accustomed that he does not think them worth recording.

Many amusing and picturesque incidents give a piquant flavor to the diary. The cry, "Made in Japan," would seem to be as appropriate to the markets of Western China as the cry, "Made in Germany," is to markets at our own doors. A travelling dentist visited the author, who was plying his profession with a stock of artificial teeth "made in Japan." In one of the cities of Sz Chuan this practitioner had fitted a hundred teeth into Chinese mouths within a month. Yarns from the mills of Osaka and Kyoto are pushing out yarns from the mills of Bombay. The advance agents of the new island Empire are everywhere, testing markets, ready to move on where there is little sign of success, and mobile as the wonderful little army itself. The frugal Chinaman was found counting the seventy matches in a box costing the fourteenth part of a penny to make sure that he got full value for his money, and that there were no headless sticks in the lot. Our author complains that the Chinaman has a vague and precarious notion of numbers. Local estimates of mileage cannot always be trusted. When a native merchant was asked how many pieces of a particular brand of black cloth he had sold in the year, he replied, "Several tens," and cross-examination could not elicit a more exact answer. But the shortcoming is not uniform. The grumbler at vague Chinese methods of computation gives himself away when he quotes from a conversation reported by the late Mr. Colborne Baber. When passing through Talifo he asked the captain of his expedition, who had been engaged in suppressing the Mohammedan rebellion a few years before, whether it was true that thirty thousand Chinese of the city had been butchered? The captain replied he "did not think there could have been more than five hundred, or the water would have stunk more." Such an answer leaves little to be desired on the score of precision. Now and again the Chinaman is appallingly concrete and arithmetical.

Our "Wandering Student" was astonished at the number of shops in Sz Chuan stocked with paper models of horses, animals, and men, together with paper cash to be burned at funerals, and seemed aghast at the waste extorted by the traditions of filial piety. "It is the exaggerated reverence for ancestors which hangs like a mill-stone upon the neck of the Chinese." But such rites have no essential connection with the cult of ancestors, and whilst the waste may be deplored, these obsequies are notes of an early humanitarian movement at which no student of primitive cults ought to scoff. Nearly four thousand years ago, in the lurid and half-legendary days which preceded the dawn of Chinese history, an attempt was made to introduce the customs of surrounding savages, who slaughtered horses and slaves and wives to be buried with the great chiefs. The humane instincts of primitive China were revolted, and the attempt has never been repeated. Figures of wood, paper, and bamboo were substituted. Whilst we may regret the waste involved in such superstitions, a student should interpret these funeral pantomimes in the light of primitive history, and do justice to the immemorial strain of gentleness which, in spite of many drawbacks, the Chinese character has never lacked. The early reformation of which these surviving superstitions are a sign is the more remarkable because it was brought to pass whilst the head of the family was accounted, as, indeed, he still is, the lord of life and death.

Earl Ronaldshay's journey through Yunnan seems to have been undertaken with the object of studying the frontier question as it affects British Burma, watching the attempts of France to create a trade route between Annam and Talifoo, and taking the temperature of the local populations upon the subject of railway concessions. There is no North-Eastern frontier question for India, as the traveller admits, with perhaps a shade of disappointment, and he and his fellow believers in a scientific frontier are free to turn their attention to the North-West of British India. It is doubtful whether France will ever complete her railway to Talifoo, and any competing line to Bhamo would be beset by enormous geographical difficulties, could not by any chance become a commercial success, and would bring a jarring note into the entente cordiale. This remote province is probably rich in mineral ores, and the suppression of the poppy may compel the Government and people to look in other directions for the means whereby prosperity may be brought to this bleak and isolated region. If there is any great development of the tin and copper mines, the traffic will probably go down the West River through Kwangsi and Kwangtung. Thirty years ago, when travelling down the West River through Kwangsi, the present reviewer anchored one night close to a fleet of twelve Chinese junks laden with copper, which was to be made into cash at the Imperial Mint in Pekin. In this remote province, which has again and again been desolated by rebellion and bloodshed, the cry of "China for the Chinese" is heard. With our own sturdy, unyielding prejudice against the construction of a Channel tunnel, it ill becomes us to treat contemptuously the Chinese prejudice against being linked by foreign railways with Burma or Annam. Nature has given China more than a streak of silver sea, Alpine ramparts five times as formidable as those which faced Napoleon when he invaded Russia.

In this "Wandering Student" we find one who is at heart a sound moralist, for he deplores the evil of opium smoking. And yet there is the Anglo-Indian "kink" in his ethic, and he sometimes does less than justice to himself. No reformer will ever achieve much who assumes that he must continue to do a reprehensible thing just as long as his neighbor continues to do it. The chapter on "The Opium Question" contains many inaccuracies. The statement that forty per cent. of a population of four hundred millions smoke opium would compel us to believe that all the women of the eighteen provinces and a large number of the children smoke. The forty per cent., of course, refers to the adult male population, which is a long way short of four hundred millions. In the "humble opinion" of our author the immediate abolition of the Indian trade would not help the Chinese Government, because the enhanced demand for the native drug would stimulate the growth of the poppy in China. As a matter of fact, China is moving much faster in the work of suppressing the poppy in her own territories than we are moving in British India. Since the publication of these two volumes a White Paper on China (No. 2) has been issued, which shows that the Viceroy of Yunnan, the province which is the stronghold of the poppy, and which from its isolated position is better fitted to rebel against the decrees of the Imperial Government than any other province of the Empire, has set himself to end all cultivation of the poppy in the territory he rules within three years. If China thinks it an easier task to end the growth and consumption of opium in three years rather than in ten, in the name of all that is sacred, she has a claim to the shorter term; and it would be a policy of gratuitous wickedness on the part of our own Government to draw out the agony of the transition for another seven years. We are glad to find this strong Anglo-Indian writer admitting that, "On the whole, more has been achieved than was to be expected."

Lord Ronaldshay is a frank admirer of Japan and its methods, and with a zeal tempered more or less with discretion, sets himself to justify the action of our ally in Manchuria and Korea. Whilst no one ought to chill the good feeling between our own country and the Island Empire of the Far East, there is another side to those questions that ought to be heard. The author admits many blemishes in the commercial morality of the Japanese traders. Foreign trade marks have been pirated, flimsy goods put upon Chinese markets fatal to the prospects of sound and permanent trade, and bargains, moreover, are not always held sacred. The commercial progress of Japan may have its setback. The cost of labor, coal, and raw material in Japan has almost doubled since the war. The glamor of the Chinaman's first love for his brilliant neighbor has passed away. Japanese statesmen are alive to the danger arising from second-rate standards of integrity in the merchant and trader, and dare to rate their countrymen soundly for practices which tend to discredit the reputation of the race. A recent speaker assumed that the introduction of nobler blood into trade and commerce would cure the disease. "The sons of our official classes are going into trade, and we are bringing 'Bushido' into business." It is a curious subject for reflection that just across the China Sea the Chinese merchant should have a reputation for commercial integrity all but unequalled, and he has not been helped by the chivalrous tradition of a caste. A proverbial classification of Chinese society, which goes back for many centuries, puts the scholar first, the husbandman second, the artificer third, and the merchant last in the scale. The soldier is outside the scale. Perhaps this was considered the order of social evolution. The Chinese merchant has had no esoteric tradition up to which he was bound to live. How are we to explain his splendid integrity? Many frailties and failings he may have, but for centuries he has been educated to the idea that debt is hereditary, and its discharge a duty of filial piety. No Statute of Limitations has brought indulgence to his conscience. Mutual sponsorship for debt tends to make him just as sensitive to all that it entails as he is to his place in a closely compacted and interdependent society; and, whilst his Supreme Being may often be impersonal, in the voice of conscience he recognises a clear, strong mandate from heaven more unreservedly perhaps than it is recognised in some schools of Christian theology.

A SCIENTIFIC NOVEL.*

In "An Immortal Soul," Mr. Mallock balances himself adroitly between the stool of science and the stool of art, the while we are never free from uneasiness that the distinguished rationalist will slip from his perch. The preface is austere: "The entire value or interest of this class of occurrences (Multiple Personality) as introduced into fiction," says the author, "depends on their unadorned fidelity to dry scientific fact." This is sufficiently alarming, but fortunately the author himself owns a dual personality; he is a satirist as well as a philosopher. And his treatment of the phenomena "observed and recorded by scientific students," though highly serious is adorned by badinage and spiced with malice.

In truth if this class of disconcerting phenomena is to be treated artistically the creative imagination must not be condemned to turn the handle of the scientific grindstone. If Mr. Mallock demurs to the "value" of Stevenson's "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," we have Mrs. Margaret Wood's delightful "The Invader," which, though less "scientific" than "An Immortal Soul," is quite as instructive, and withal more brilliantly written. The deeper is an author's psychological genius the further does it carry him "outside the radius" of the scientist's vision. The "Brothers Karamazov" or "Hamlet," for example, owe their psychological truths not at all to "facts scientifically recorded." They are the artist's syntheses of states of feeling far too complex and volatile for scientific investigation. And the artist who handles Multiple Personality may, of course, follow "recorded cases," but we expect him to fuse the facts, dry and scientific, into an aesthetic whole. It is just here that Mr. Mallock, too carefully balancing himself, half fails. His novel, clever and instructive, is like a flying machine which refuses to leave the rails for more than a few seconds at a time. And the cause is obvious. The author is far stronger in reasoning than in feeling, and his creative imagination is too subordinated to the preparation of the scene, atmosphere, and characters for the demonstrations of his man of science, Dr. Thistlewood.

For the first hundred pages of the story the satirist, indeed, has a free field. We are introduced to the polite society of Southquay, an English watering-place which boasts of the retired diplomatist and landowner, Sir Rawlin Stantor; Mr. Theophilus Barton, the Ritualistic priest of All Saints; Lady Susannah of Cliff's End, and her charming niece, Miss Nest Vivian; Colonel O'Brian, a lady-killing warrior; Lord Cotswold, the scientist; and the celebrated psychologist, Dr. Gustav Thistlewood, along with the usual residential Anglo-Indians on the shelf, maiden ladies, and ex-professional men. These figures and their milieu are touched in with the dry, man-of-the-world cynicism that distinguishes Mr. Mallock, and after some puzzled moments we resign ourselves to watching the satirist in pursuit of his prey, and do not ask him to rise to the higher plane of truth, to the subtlety of nature. Mr. Mallock's quarry in question is the Rev. Theophilus Barton, and the priest is hunted from sanctuary to sanctuary, smoked out of his theological lairs, and finally despatched in the open with a cold-blooded pertinacious skill that must please the sceptic as much as it will startle the devout. With a malice that both surpasses and inspires his art the author introduces us into the cleric's spiritual citadel at the moment when he is trying to reconcile celibacy as a part of his own "personal vocation" with the secret fountain of fervour, not wholly religious, that is welling from his intercourse with the charming and graceful girl, Miss Nest Vivian, whom he is preparing for Confirmation. It is, perhaps, a little unkind to Mr. Mallock to select one out of his 350 pages and style it his best, but the quotation may serve to show how his satire can be finely edged, though often, indeed, it is not free from vulgarity:—

> "By the way, let me show you another thing which I got for her, and which I think will help her. She has a curious natural sympathy with—where did I put this, now?—ah, there, on this little table—a curious sympathy with the Catholic conception of religion. Here the book is. It is called "The Visions of the Saints." The letterpress is very simple. What I want you to notice are the pictures. These modern processes—aren't they perfectly marvellous? Did you ever see anything more like actual miniatures? That's St. Angela of Foliguo, with our Lord coming to her through the rose-bushes. Isn't the little robin sweet? Look how one or two of its little red feathers are rumpled. That's our Lord giving the aromatic gum to St. Gertrude, in order that her breath might be no less sweet to him than her prayers. That one again—I should like you to examine that through a magnifying glass. Our Lord's dress as he kisses St. Sylvia's hair—do you notice the gold and the red lines in the border? You can see that the gold line is a piece of stiff braid appliqué. And between the folds of the robe—do you make out what that is? It's the face of St. Francis which she saw painted on our Lord's breast. But I mustn't bore you any longer with this. Perhaps you'd like to take a look round my crib."
> The suggestion being accepted, he led the way into a smaller room.
> "Here," he said, "is my inner den—my cell."
> The floor was of bare, stained boards. The only furniture was a couple of hard oak chairs, monastic in pattern, but affecting no antiquity; a small table with a stool before it, apparently used for kneeling; and a desk supporting a rosary, some devotional books and a manuscript, the window which lit it opening on a new little patch of garden. The only decoration on the whitewashed walls was a crucifix, the figure being of the cheapest plaster.
> "I always think," said Mr. Barton, seeing that Sir Rawlin noticed it, "that there's something rather jolly in that. I like to feel that I use in my own devotions nothing not in reach of the poorest." . . .
> As soon as Mr. Barton was alone he became a changed man. The expression which has accompanied his use of such artificially familiar words as "nice" or "sweet," and "crib" or of "jolly" in its schoolboy sense, altogether disappeared. The priest came out in his face; the receiver of calls faded. Returning to his library, with eyes absorbed and solemn, he sat down by the writing table, his chin resting heavily on his hand.

The marked interest that the accomplished Sir Rawlin begins to show in the lovely Miss Vivian, and the arrival on the scene of the materialist, Dr. Thistlewood, with his psychological exposition of "the immortal soul as a product of a bundle of perishable nerves," excites in the priest such a tender solicitude for the heroine's soul that in his spiritual ecstasy he sees himself "coming into his Master's presence bearing a lamb, a lamb that might else have been lost." And it seems to Mr. Barton that his prayer is answered by a divine voice, "As thou art present in My heart, so let her be in thine. Bring thy lamb to Me that she may be in My heart also." Inspired by a peculiar sense of beatitude, Mr. Barton forthwith preaches a sermon on the indivisibility of the soul, laying it down with fervor that "the indestructibility and the responsibility of the self are implicitly the fundamental doctrines of the psychology of the Christian Church." The novel turns on this issue: the perplexing instrument that Mr. Mallock produces from the lecture rooms of the Continental schools of psychiatry and psychology with which to lay the priest low, being the Dual Personality of the dove-like heroine, Miss Nest Vivian. Miss Vivian is, in fact, "a case," typical of many such cases. As the girl Nest she is exquisitely feminine, quiet, gentle, and full of fastidious grace and spiritual fervor. But she is prone to curious fits of dreaminess and lassitude, and after nervous shocks or sudden excitements she falls into a trance, and reawakes as the startling personality of Miss Enid Wynn, a slangy, mannish, and jaunty young lady with a passion for rat-catching, chauffeurs, field sports, and a robustious dislike for the clergy! Now could Mr. Mallock's creative imagination have risen superior to his philosophic intelligence, "An Immortal Soul" might have been a most powerful satire on the priestly soul. For, according to the special crux posited, all the psychological truths so painfully exhibited are in direct conflict with Mr. Barton's religious faith, and neither his spiritual creed nor his human passion can withstand the shock of the revelation when it comes, viz., that Miss Nesta Vivian Enid Wynn has not only received all the sacraments of the Church, but has also a husband alive in the person of a very objectionable Italian swindler, and not only so, but she has also given birth to a child. Each of the two personalities in Miss Vivian by turns suppresses the other, but according to medical history attested by Dr. Thistlewood, the "original self" is Miss Wynn and not Miss Vivian, who is, so to say, the surface self. Should Mr. Barton have succeeded in marrying the spiritual Miss Vivian, it is ten to one that he would have had to pass most of his days in the society of the sinner and infidel, Miss Wynn, who despises and jeers at his most sacred beliefs. Mr. Barton is stunned by this final revelation. He is left asking, "If a woman's character is not her own character at all, but merely the successive gleamings of a shot-silk dress worn by her . . . how can this business of living and loving be reasonably carried on? . . . If our souls are not our own souls . . . what shall we get in exchange for them?"

Mr. Mallock undoubtedly succeeds in establishing the triumph of Dr. Thistlewood's scientific creed over the outworn theological tenets of Mr. Barton's faith. And in passing he demonstrates with malicious satisfaction the strong earthly alloy in the priest's spiritual desires. Nevertheless, the satire or novel can scarcely be called a true work of art. From the moment Dr. Thistlewood appears with his lectures on "The New Pyschology," his hypnotic expositions, and his obvious familiarity with Miss Vivian's past, we recognise that he holds all the trumps, and that Mr. Barton may as well abandon the contest. The interminable arguments in which the antagonists engage smack of the lecture hall, and the clever scenes interspersed have a prearranged air. There are far too many characters in the novel, and many of the conversations, such as the flippant Lady Conroy's, are merely distracting. But the chief artistic mistake which means the destruction of the book's spontaneity and artistic surprise lies in the introduction of the lay-figure, Dr. Thistlewood, with his scientific dissertations. The real psychological situation lies simply in the conflict in the priest's soul when the suspicion dawns upon him of the uncanny transformation coming upon his bride. A psychological genius such as Dostoievsky would have handled the theme with only four leading characters—the girl, the priest, an aunt or companion, who tries to conceal the uncanny truth, and the girl's old lover or husband coming back from the past to claim her. We should then have seen concentrated all the elements of terror and confusion swallowing up the priest's faith, but such a treatment would have been passed through the fire of the creative imagination, it would be intensely human without parti pris, and its depths could not be sounded or gauged by its "unadorned fidelity to dry scientific fact."

ANNUALS AND OTHERS.

"The Boy's Own Annual" and "The Girl's Own Annual" (8s. each), both published by the Religious Tract Society, have for upwards of a quarter of a century been prime favorites with young people, and this year shows no falling off in the interest and variety of their contents. We find the usual assortment of tales of school life and of adventure, interspersed with hints upon games both outdoor and indoor, natural history, carpentry, and other similar subjects. Among the contributors are Dr. Gordon Stables, Mr. Allen French, Mr. H. A. Hinkson, Mr. G. H. S. Trott, who once captained the Australian Eleven, Mrs. Weigall, Miss Quiller-Couch, and Miss Annie G. Hopkins. The boy or girl who finds nothing of interest in these volumes must be very difficult to please.—"Herbert Strang's Annual" (Frowde and Chatto & Windus, 5s. net), makes its first appearance this year, and judging from the level of excellence reached, it is destined for a long and prosperous career. Its editor is one of our foremost living writers for boys, and his story, "Captain Q.," the scene of which is laid on the Spanish Main in the days of Drake, is filled with stirring adventures. There are also stories by Mr. Desmond Coke, Dr. Gordon Stables, Captain Gilson, and others, a capital series of articles, including "How to Keep Fit," by Mr. J. L. Jessop, and "The Latest in Locomotives," by the Rev. J. R. Howden, which are sure to appeal to boys.—"The Girl's Realm Annual" (Cassell, 8s. 6d.) gives a great deal of useful information about dress, gardening, occupations for women, and kindred subjects. One of the chief features is a series of articles called "A Débutante's Experiences of the Past Season," and there are, of course, a number of serial stories. Some of the famous Christmas pictures of the past—among them Mr. E. T. Reed's diverting "Prehistoric Peeps"—which are here reproduced, provoke a comparison between the Christmas pictures of some years ago and those of to-day that is not always to the advantage of the present.—"Blackie's Children's Annual" (Blackie, 3s. 6d.) will delight the small children for whom it is intended. The stories and rhymes are effective and the pictures excellent. But nothing less could be expected when Miss Evelyn Sharp, E. Nesbit, Mr. H. M. Brock, Mr. John Hassall, and Mr. Gordon Browne are among the contributors.—"Chums" (Cassell, 8s.) has now reached its sixteenth year of issue, and is always welcomed by boy readers. Among the serials is an excellent tale by Mr. Bloundelle Burton, called "The Hispaniola Plate," and the articles are fresh and full of interest.

"Yesterday's Children" (Chatto & Windus, 3s. 6d.) is a book of original verses by Githa Sowerby, with illustrations by Milicent Sowerby. The verses are pretty, with a faint suggestion of R. L. Stevenson about them. The best, in our view, are those called "The Little Puritan," which tells how—

> "She also learned when very young
> To move without a sound,
> And wear her collars straight in front,
> Her eyes upon the ground."

The accompanying illustration shows her pacing to church with downcast eyes, while "the gay and naughty cavaliers" are laughing as she passes by. Another good little poem is "The First Doll," with the charming simile in its second line:—

> "Her head was just a piece of wood,
> Her hair was straight as water—
> She never was inside a shop,
> And no one ever bought her."

Miss Milicent Sowerby's illustrations, especially her head- and tail-pieces, are excellent, and the whole get-up of the book is artistic.

For young people who wish to know something about the artists represented in our great national collections, we can heartily recommend "The National Gallery," by Miss Alice Corkran, and "The Wallace and Tate Galleries," by Miss Estelle Ross, both of which have recently appeared in Messrs. Wells, Gardner & Co.'s "The Treasure House Series" (2s. 6d. net each). It is not an easy task to describe a number of pictures and give short biographies of the men who painted them, and at the same time to avoid the dullness and insipidity of most guide books, but both authors have suceeded admirably in their tasks. The information is given in a bright and chatty style. There are a large number of illustrations and excellent indexes in each volume, and we know nothing more likely to foster a taste for art among young people than a visit to one of these three galleries, with Miss Corkran or Miss Ross as guide.

MAKERS TO H.M. THE KING

Those of us who can look back on long hours spent (often compulsorily) with Mrs. Sherwood's heroes and heroines will be inclined to wonder whether she is still read in days when books for children are for the most part of a very different type. That she is not forgotten is shown by the inclusion of "The Fairchild Family" and "Margot and the Golden Fish" in Messrs. Jack's pretty series "Grandmother's Favorites" (2s. net each). Both have been edited and greatly shortened, most of the religious and moralising elements being left out. We are not quite sure that this is altogether an advantage. Children either like Mrs. Sherwood very much or they are bored by her stories "calculated to show the importance and effects of a religious education." The present series attempts to retain the jam while leaving out the powder, but in this laudable effort a good deal of Mrs. Sherwood's charm is lost. The same series contains "Holiday House," by Catherine Sinclair, and "The Apple Pie," a collection of tales by various writers. The volumes are charmingly illustrated, and have a dainty and attractive appearance.

Another series intended to make children familiar with the famous stories of the past is Mr. Heinemann's "Every Child's Library" (1s. 6d. net each volume), edited by Mr. Thomas Cartwright. "Reynard the Fox" is a good adaptation with as little change as possible from Caxton's work. "Brave Beowulf" is a rendering of our oldest English epic, the only fault of which is that children will find some difficulty in pronouncing the names. The eighteenth century is represented by "Sir Roger de Coverley" and "My Uncle Toby." Both are well suited for inclusion in the series, though we do not think that children will thank Mr. Cartwright for telling them that the Coverley papers will teach them "much as to Stuart times and more as to the right conduct of their own lives, for Sir Roger was a truly good man, and one of Nature's gentlemen." The statements are unimpeachable, but Mr. Cartwright's readers might have been trusted to reach these conclusions on their own account. All the books are illustrated, and produced in what, we think, is far the best size for children.

Reprints and New Editions.—A delightful series of reprints is Messrs. Bell's "Queen's Treasures Series." Mrs. Gaskell's "Cousin Phillis" and Mrs. Ewing's "Six to Sixteen" have appeared with charming illustrations by Miss M. V. Wheelhouse. Mr. Thomas Seccombe contributes a preface to "Cousin Phillis" which contains some fresh biographical material founded on unpublished letters by Mrs. Gaskell.—Messrs. Methuen issue a new translation by Mr A. C. Farquharson of La Motte Fouqué's "Sintram and His Companions" (7s. 6d. net). Mr. E. J. Sullivan's illustrations have vigor, though they are not always free from confusion.—"Old Christmas," by Washington Irving (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.), has a series of capital illustrations in color by Mr. Cecil Aldin.—Mr. Kipling's "Jungle Book" (Macmillan, 5s.), has been illustrated effectively by Messrs. Maurice and Edward Detmold. Our only fault is some of the pictures seem to aim at being grotesque when a greater realism would be in better keeping.—"Mother Goose" (Blackie, 5s.), edited by Mr. Walter Jerrold, and illustrated by Mr. John Hassall, contains an excellent collection of nursery rhymes.—"The Land of Enchantment" (Cassell, 5s. net) consists of five stories reprinted from "Little Folks," together with illustrations by Mr. Arthur Rackham, which also appeared in that periodical.—Mr. John Lane issues "Alice's Adventures in Wonderland" (2s. 6d. net), with illustrations by Mr. W. H. Walker, and Stevenson's "Child's Garland of Verses," with Mr. Charles Robinson's pictures. Lewis Carroll's book has tempted a host of artists since the copyright expired, but whether from innate conservatism or from a more worthy reason none of them seem to us to compare with Sir John Tenniel. Mr. Walker's pictures are amusing and in sympathy with Lewis Carroll's fantasy.

It has been, in the Stock Exchange, a week of small things. Business of a humdrum character is about as much as can be expected from the account which precedes Christmas, and, in point of tradition, it would be by no means astonishing if orders came to something of a standstill during the last few weeks of the year. But there is a certain amount of trade doing in the markets, and the hub upon which prices are again turning is the political outlook in the Balkans. The various scraps of news which have come in lately are read as indicating the possibility of a peaceful settlement being reached, while markets draw further consolation from the consideration that no actual fighting can take place until the spring, before which season there is time for much water to flow down the mountains and under the bridges. The Emperor of Austria is applauded for his apparent desire to maintain peace: his influence is expected to count for a great deal in the counsels of the Near Eastern nations that delight in war.

Politics and Prices.

Declaration of the poll at Chelmsford led to a little amusement on the part of the militant Stock Exchange Unionists, and to a little genial "ragging" of members who support the Government. The result, however, failed to exercise any influence over quotations, and the figures, after being chanted as a dirge at prominent Liberals in the Stock Exchange, were soon relegated to the limbo of history. There are many in the City, and probably throughout the country, who parade their belief that a change of Administration would lift all their securities on to a permanent level of much better prices, upheld by Protection and Preference and similar gourds. Yet when all the talk goes on about the iniquities and obliquities of a Liberal Government, curiosity wonders whether the valiant warriors in words would fight quite so strenuously were they faced with the straight issue of voting for Free Trade or Protection, for most men are sane enough when it comes to a practical question which cannot help affecting the pocket of the individual voter.

Peace in the Far East.

Investment is turning with renewed favor to the bonds of Japan, China, and Russia, by way of direct corollary to the new agreement arrived at between the Governments of the Mikado and the Czar, whereby peace in the Far East is seated more firmly in her throne than has been the case since the Russo-Japanese war. The dove with the olive branch has done exceedingly useful work of late in her journeyings between Russia and Japan, and the Stock market has hastened to express its approval by steady rises in Japanese bonds. Russian issues are too much under the influence of the forthcoming big Loan to appreciate the more peaceful outlook to the same extent as Japanese bonds; but Chinese Government securities are benefiting, because the statements in the agreement with regard to China are particularly timely, following so quickly upon the recent deaths of the Emperor of China and his mother. It would appear, however, that affairs in the Far East are almost as satisfactory as those in the Near East are the reverse, and if only Japan can school herself to keep within the paths of national economy already marked out, the investor is not likely to have his sleep disturbed o' nights by fears relating to his interests either in China or Japan.

THE RUIN OF ENGLAND.

"That man, Sir," said the little General to the curate, "is the Ruin of England." And the curate agreed. I was of an impressionable age—six or seven—and I was impressed.

When the grown-ups were gone, I asked dear Mary, in low tones, such as one used in Church, who that man was—that dreadful man who was the Ruin of England.

"They mean Mr. Joystone, dearest," she said, and showed me his portrait in the "Illustrated London News." I could see nothing ruinous about him, but I knew that the General must know best.

Dear Mary and I were at a place whose name shines to me through the mist of years as the Pwllychrochyllan Hotel. If there be such a hotel it is probably in Wales. At any rate it was by the sea. And measles had possibly preceded my residence there. Mary was my governess. She had a pale face, and pale hair, and she was very sweet; that, I once heard a grown-up explain, was why so many people called her dear Mary. The General did not call her "dear Mary" yet—but he was destined to do so one day, and meantime he used to come to tea with us. And sometimes the curate came. Only the tea was coffee—I can't think why—and I was allowed to have it—I can't think how.

Dear Mary was very sweet. She called me dearest, and told me not to gather the daisies because God made them. She restrained my pursuit of clever little grey-green crabs on the same grounds. So I was very bored at the Pwllychrochyllan Hotel; and when three little girls in red coats came with their governess to stay there I hoped we might be friends.

But Mary had warned me not to talk to strange children on the beach.

"Why?" I asked; "did God make them too?" to which she replied:

"Of course, dearest, but your Papa wouldn't like it."

But when I came across the three little red coats among the foundations of a Gothic villa that someone was building among the sand and coarse grass and pine trees, I reflected that this was certainly not the beach, and ventured to say, "Hullo!"

The eldest red coat replied, "Hullo, you're the little boy at our hotel."

"You're the little girls at my hotel," I corrected; "I was there first!"

"But there are three of us!" one said as if that settled it.

"But I'm a boy," said I conclusively.

This gave us food for a conversation which lasted till the barriers of convention were broken down and we were able to erect a see-saw and throw sand in each other's eyes with all the pleasant familiarity of old friends.

We went back to the hotel all four together—I a little doubtful about my reception by dear Mary, whose notions of the conflicts between God's ideas and Papa's were a little confusing to me.

Dear Mary greeted me with that unmistakable sweetness of hers, and instantly and surprisingly invited the little red coats to tea.

"I didn't meet them on the beach," I said, when they had been taken away to have their hands washed.

"They are quite proper children for you to know, dearest," said dear Mary. "Their grandfather is Mr. Joystone."

"The Ruin of England?" I said aghast.

"Hush, dearest," said Mary; "you mustn't talk about such things; especially before his granddaughters."

The next time I met the General, I asked him, man to man, what he meant by the Ruin of England.

"Ruins the country," he explained, "with his abominable radical ideas."

"He isn't a ruin like Carnarvon Castle?"

"No, of course not."

"Of course not," I murmured in courteous acquiescence. "Of course I knew he couldn't be that. I only asked."

The General snorted, not unkindly.

"Where does he do his ruining?" I asked.

"In Parliament, on platforms, in the papers, everywhere. Go along and play, there's a good boy," said the little General. And I went along, but I did not play. I sat down on the beach and wondered.

"Did God make the Ruin of England—I mean Mr. Joystone," I inquired later of dear Mary, who replied:

"Of course, dearest, God made everything."

I suppressed a "Why?" that fluttered near my lips and substituted:

"Of course. I know that. I only asked."

And the Ruin's grandchildren were great friends with me. I was very sorry for them. It must be very dreadful, I perceived, to have a grandfather who was the Ruin of England. My own grandfather was an Irish landlord. I had heard someone say, at election time, that he was the prop of the country. What a difference! But, perhaps, the little red coats did not know what it was that they had for a grandfather. Well, they should never know it from me. Honor sealed my lips. I would be just as nice to them as though their grandfather was a prop, and not a ruin.

The red coats and I were always together. Their governess was a hard, big woman, with a nose. She had other features, no doubt, but only that one impressed me. She and Mary read Schiller together on the beach in real German that no ordinary person could read. It was very clever of them, and left me a good deal of liberty. Miss Nose admired dear Mary very much. I heard her telling her to her face that she was sweet. And Mary smiled, and said: "Oh, no, dearest Miss Nose"—or whatever her name was—"it is you who are so sweet and kind."

From being sorry for the grandchildren of the Ruin, I grew—to my own deep shame—to be sorry for the Ruin himself. It must, if you come to think of it, be a dreadful thing to be the ruin of your country, instead of dying for it, like people in the Bible or in history, or being the prop of it, like one's own grandfather. From wondering whether the red coats knew, I came to wonder whether he, the Ruin, even, knew the awful truth about himself. Perhaps he ruined England without knowing it. I had heard my Irish nurse, not so long ago, talk about sinning in ignorance. Perhaps this was what he did. Suppose he didn't know, oughtn't someone to tell him? Wouldn't it be for his own good? Dear Mary always told me of my faults, and she always said it was for my own good.

"Do you think he knows he's the Ruin of England?" I put the question to dear Mary, between buttons, as I was being dressed for tea. I was always dressed for tea when the little General was coming, and he was coming that day, after being away in London for a week.

"Hush! dearest," said dear Mary, buttoning inexorably. "I thought I forebade you to talk about such things."

"But if he doesn't know"—I persisted, wriggling away from the firm, cold fingers busy at my collar—"oughtn't you to tell him? Perhaps he's sinning in ignorance, and he'd stop if he knew what he was doing."

"If you don't stand still, dearest, I can't button you," said Mary; "and little boys can't understand such things."

"But does he know?" I persisted, giving way in the matter of the collar.

"Of course not, dearest," said Mary. "Now, I forbid you to speak to me of this again. Little boys should not repeat the careless remarks of their elders."

The red coats and the General were to come to tea at four. I was dressed by three, and I went out into the hotel grounds. And there I met my doom. I came upon it suddenly. On a rustic seat sat the Ruin of England. I knew him at once, from the picture, from his unusual collar, and from the fact that one of the little red coats had just hugged him, and gone off to the house: on a message, I knew, by the way she dragged her feet.

Now was my chance. I thought of Luther and Daniel, and people who "testified," as dear Mary called it. I thought of Moses and Pharaoh. I had always thought if Pharaoh had had things explained to him more kindly . . ."

I marched up to the Ruin and opened my mouth.

"Well, little man," said the Ruin, speaking with the most wonderful voice in the world, "I have been hearing about you from my grandchildren. Fine games you have been having, I hear."

I am told that I was, for a child, almost morbidly polite. It seemed quite superlatively difficult—a task for a hero—to tell this kind and noble-looking old gentleman what sort of thing he really was.

So I said, "Yes, sir," and felt that I liked him, quite a lot. I also felt quite sure now about his ignorance. No one with a voice like that could be the Ruin of England, and know it. Yet the more I liked him, the more I felt that he ought to be told for his own good.

"You must tell me all about it," he said. "What do you play? Hide and seek? Blind man's buff? Hunt the slipper?"

"Oh," I said vaguely, "we just play."

Then I saw a red coat coming back, with something in her hand—gloves, or a muffler, or something—and I looked at the Ruin's face, and my small heart went out to him and I said:

"Do you know that you're the Ruin of England?"

There was a pause—patter, patter went my heart, startled at the behaviour of my tongue.

"The ruin of England—I?" he said.

"They say you are," said I. "Oh, don't be it any more! Oh, don't!"

"My little man," he said, "you should never repeat disparaging remarks which you hear uttered by the thoughtless and irresponsible."

"Not for people's own good?" I said, ignoring the long words, and addressing myself to the sense.

"Not even for that," he said, and then red coat came up, and they went away, and I felt quite sure that the Ruin did not like me at all. And I wanted, quite dreadfully I wanted, that he should like me.

I believe he went away to speak at a meeting or something dull of that sort, and the three red coats came to tea, which was coffee, and served in cups with birds and roses and dark blue borders and raised gold squiggles—very fine china—on the General's account, I suppose.

The coffee tasted bitter, and the seed cake seemed dry. I was not happy. I had told the Ruin the truth, and he had not liked it. Well, I had had enough of telling people things for their own good. And his grandchildren did not know; that was one thing.

So I munched, morose; dear Mary rallied me on my silence, and the eldest red coat, after making a really first-class face at me behind dear Mary's back, was so disgusted at my lack of appreciation that she positively kicked me.

And then the little General came in, late and heated.

"Dearest Miss Mary," he said fussily, "that man's in the town, actually in the town, addressing a meeting, as I'm a sinner!"

"What man?" asked dear Mary. "What are you kicking me for, dearest?" she added—not, of course, to the General, but to me.

"I wasn't," I lied.

"The Ruin of England," said the General, as I had known he would.

"Who's the Ruin of England?" the youngest red coat had asked, and I had known that would happen, too.

"That ass, Joystone," was the answer, and "that ass" was plain in the ears of all. But the name, the name, to my pride and joy, was lost in the rattling, splashing fall of my blue and gilt and rosy and birdy coffee cup. It fell half on my saucer and half on my plate, so that all three were shattered, and the hot coffee went all over everything. But the danger was averted.

"Mr. Joystone," I shouted, amid a turmoil of shocked and interested "oh's," of chairs pushed back, of bells rung for maids with cloths, "Mr. Joystone is the little girls' grandfather!"

"You are a very naughty, careless little boy, dearest," said Mary, taking me strongly by the arm, "and I shall put you to bed at once. The Worcester tea service," she said appealingly to the General, who snorted and said, "Children were a great trial."

So I was put to bed; thrilling with conscious and triumphant martyrdom. The warmth of this gave place slowly to the chill certainty that I had made a fool of myself.

Next day the Ruin of England was gone.

A day or two later a postcard came from him to the red coats. I asked timidly whether he had said anything about me.

"Not on the card," said the eldest, darkly.

"But he did before he left," said the youngest.

"When we told him about your upsetting your Worcester coffee," said the middle one.

"What did he say?" I faltered.

"He said you were a clumsy little boy."

And that was the tragedy—because I knew even then that the one person at the Pwllychrochyllan Hotel who could have understood the whole business—my hesitations, decisions, martyrdoms, testifyings, and remorses—was, after all, the Great Man whom the little General had called the Ruin of England.

HARLEQUIN AND COLUMBINE.

Columbine sat in the moonlight waiting for Harlequin. He was late in coming; but her heart was light with love's laughter, and waiting for him held the great sweet joy of anticipation.

The moon looked down on the garden. Cypress trees and sycamores ringed it round. It was a circle of silence except for the nightingale's song which came throbbing, soaring, rioting out of the trees. Happy bird! Happy night! Most happy Columbine!

Flowers loved that old garden. They were radiant there, sweeping in a tangle—golden, red and blue—across the greenness. Columbine rejoiced in their luxuriant beauty, because it gave color to her rapture, adding strength and glory to her dreams.

Delight seemed lurking everywhere—in the moonlight, in the silence, in the birds' songs, in the glances of the stars. All of that night was beautiful, beautiful; and she the blessedest Columbine that ever sang nonsense-songs or poised pretty feet in a saraband.

Harlequin was long in coming. Nightingales sang, wearied; and sang again. There was no pause in their night-long anthem.

Columbine waited happily; but Harlequin did not come. The tangle of flowers climbed on all places beside her. Their heavy scent seemed to thrall her. She was as a maid in a mist and sang love-melodies. She played with the blooms, kissed them, fondled them, and pressed them to her bosom. She sighed to them, and told them of her love, of her hopes, of Harlequin. Still he did not come. Looking up at the moon, it seemed smiling on her. Columbine in her joy of heart thought it was kindness: but moon's smiles are never kind.

Impulsively she parted the flowers tangled thickly in front of her. With their tendrils they clung to each other like lovers refusing to part. Must she separate them? she asked, with a sigh, happily. Should such embraces be sundered? Happy leaf lovers! How tightly they clung: how bravely they resisted her. She laughed and looked defiance at the moon. She blew it a kiss with the tips of her fingers; and tore the flowers apart.

Beneath them, shrouded by them, where she was sitting, was a tomb-stone, cracked with time. She read the inscription,

"Sacred to the Memory of a Broken Heart."

Columbine put the flowers together, restoring their embraces; and laughed.

II.

Hours drifted by. Clouds came and went. The moon raced past them. The stars went wheeling westward. The great planet of love rose up and splendidly shone. Harlequin did not come. Columbine still waited.

In the moonlight fairies had come and danced around her. They scrambled amongst the flowers and flew above her head like fragments of light in a rapture. Puck—no other than he—sat on her knee and watched her with mischievous eyes; but Columbine, though happy through their presence, was quite unconscious of the fairies. They laughed and sang and mocked and went away; and still, all heedless of them, Columbine waited.

A clock struck and a cock crew. A grey glint of dawn crept out of the east. A cold wind came with it and blew on the trees. Columbine shivered, rose, and stretched her limbs. Then she knew that many hours had gone; that Harlequin had deserted her. Her little head drooped. She was willing to cry; but the joy of waiting had been strong within her, its happiness lingered. She would not give a tear to him then.

As the sun peeped over the hill Columbine crept into bed. It was not long before she went to sleep. In her dreams she murmured "Harlequin!"

III.

It was the time again for the tryst. The place was sweeter than ever. Again the nightingales sang, the fairies danced, the moon lighted the flowers in their tangled loveliness.

But Columbine was not happy. There were tears in her thoughts now; sobs were heavy in her throat. But she forced them back; for to weep now was to lose faith in Harlequin, and she trusted him even yet.

Still Harlequin did not come. Why? why? why? why? Reasons many and various, possible, improbable, and tragic, hurried through her poor little brain. Something had happened: that was certain. Dear stars, do not let him be hurt! she sighed.

An owl hooted. Bats came from their darkness to flit about and above her. She heard their little shrill cries and took them for comfort. Still Harlequin did not come.

Clocks struck the hours. How slowly, how speedily they passed, marking the going of time. "Sweet Harlequin, come!" she murmured anxiously, more anxiously. But he did not come.

Her fingers touched the flowers sadly. She wanted to part them, to read the words they covered; but the fear of an omen was heavy in her heart.

Dawn came again. She rose, and turned wearily homewards. She was weeping now. Poor Columbine!

IV.

As she went wearily homeward she passed folks and cronies in merry masquerade. There were Pierrot and Pierrette yawning; Mimi and Marcel, Dindon and Zou-Zou, Tweedledum and Tweedledee, with Monsieur Chocolat singing songs of the moonshine, and others—several others—gaily decked, chattering, laughing, carelessly happy. They were butterfly people. Now they were gay, light-hearted, joying in the light of day and lights of night—to-morrow—ah, to-morrow! They would be as the leaves of yester-year, as last night's merry music—not even memories.

As they passed by her they cheered drooping Columbine with words of laughter; but their gaiety and greetings did not hearten her. Her courage was deep down under her ankles; too low to be lifted up by anyone but Harlequin.

She was as tired as too-much-kindness. She came to a doorstep and sat upon it, too weary for weeping. She rested her head on her hand and fell into sleep.

She heard Harlequin's voice in her dreams. He was speaking of love. The grief of her heart went like mist of the morning when the sun has risen high. Her dreams were near to heaven's gate.

"You I love, only you I love, I love only you!"

Such was the burden of Harlequin's saying. The sweet words and the dear voice! How well she knew—how better than well she loved them.

It was delight to dream of them. To wake to them was still greater joy. She woke for love, and rose eagerly from the step, her heart full of kisses for him.

"Harlequin! Harlequin! Your Columbine is here!"

A window was opened. How it creaked! There was whispering, soft laughter, sounds of kisses.

Columbine started back, and stared with eyes of fear.

Harlequin climbed from the window and sprang to the ground. He broke a branch from a rose bush and trampled on flowers.

"Now you may sleep, Lucetta!" he cried, and ran away, laughing.

A white hand waved from the window; it threw to him kisses.

Columbine shrank into the shadows. Now she knew! She wandered away, dead to everything, blind to where she was going.

V.

On the next day Harlequin found her. He knelt beside her in shame. She was lying in a garden, face downward in a tangle of flowers. Her silvery dress was soaked with dew. Pink petals were scattered on her dress, in her hair.

"Columbine! Columbine!" he cried in remorse and heavy grief; but she made no answer. A skylark's ringing song mocked him. Bees buzzed near him. A bell was tolled solemnly.

She did not hear. Her waiting was ended. "Columbine, Columbine!" he cried.

In despair he tried to lift her. Her head fell against his spangles. Her flowing hair blinded his eyes. Her lips were bruised with kissing the stone. He read an inscription still wet with her tears; and groaned aloud.

"Sacred to the Memory of a Broken Heart."

THE CHILD'S BOOK.*

Of all the common and stupid questions ever asked, "Do you like children?" is the commonest and stupidest. It is stupider even than "How do you do?" for it is supposed to have some meaning and it waits for an answer. Like children! That always depends on another question: "What children?" Sometimes it depends on a third question: "Whose children?" If you may put neither of those questions, the only satisfactory answer when a lady asks you how you like children is Charles Lamb's, "B-b-boiled, madam!"

Here and there a child is quite lovable, even for others than its parents, and children are often nice enough; sometimes they are utterly detestable. Of course, there is no need to despair over a detestable child. There are various ways of being detestable, and many people hate a child for what is nothing but a promise of vitality—the only endowment that counts. Such a child may grow into something fine, just as a pirate makes a particularly interesting old man. But because it will very likely turn out all right, there is no reason to maunder over it whilst it is still sulky, ill-mannered, nasty tempered, or sunk in selfishness. People who go about saying that all children are adorable, either know nothing about them or have been befooled with sticky sentiment. Let them drivel about the sweetness of childhood, and the joy of watching a baby in a bath or a child at a pantomime. Even sticky sentiment is useful if it ever reaches the healthy stage of tips.

There is every bit as much difference between children as between men and women. The philosopher who said he could take all mankind to his bosom and keep it warm, would have held a rather mixed society in his embrace. The diversity among children is quite as violent—perhaps more violent, for, carefully as most children try to conceal their nature, they are often less successful than the grown-up in their disguise. For writers of children's books the diversity is most fortunate, for, as long as it is a real children's book, their work may be on almost any subject and in any style. This was something of a discovery to our fathers, though it looks so obvious now. A century ago children's books deliberately aimed at useful or moral teaching, and were not books at all. Forty years ago, boys were allowed a taste of the prairie and scalping knife, girls the condescending joys of charity to the poor. But death-bed scenes were considered specially edifying for both. And now what a change! Among the hogsheads of children's books that pour from the publishers at Christmas, what gaiety, pathos, adventure, and charm! What infinite variety! It is like the variety of children themselves.

It seems next to impossible to select or group the books together. There are so many good, and the best are all so different. Let us take only a baker's dozen of the best. What a triumph of art there is in them! Any art is almost hopelessly difficult, but writing children's books is about the most difficult of all. The gulf between the story-teller and the audience is so wide—wider than between the painter and the commercial gentleman for whom he paints—and the criticism is remorseless, inconsiderate, and unerring, as long as parents do not interfere. Besides, the story-teller has to steer between two rocks that close on his passage. He must lay aside his cleverness, he must forget his literary friend, he must write for the mind of a child, but he must not write down to it. The moment the story-teller turns an eye to see how his clever friends like it, the child goes to sleep. The moment the story-teller "talks down" the child walks away. It is a perilous case. The wonder is that anyone comes through safe.

Some do, and Mrs. Bland ("E. Nesbit") is one of the surest. Along that difficult strait she never even scrapes the rocks. Her stories are always real children's stories, written neither to display her cleverness nor in condescension for "the young." "The House of Arden" tells of the nicest brother and sister that ever were, and how they explored their ancestral home, and by a quite natural kind of magic were carried back to great and wonderful scenes that once had really happened within those ancient walls. Now, of all fascinating adventures there is none to compare to entering an old, old house, where the furniture has stood unmoved for years and years, and ghosts sit in the empty chairs and warm themselves at dusty hearths. The present writer did it once. He has enjoyed many adventures since, but nothing to compare to the moment when he broke a dirty window-pane and entered those silent and shadowy rooms. That is what the boy and girl of Arden do, and it is a lovely story of dear old people and strange deeds that they find still laid up in the vanished past of their fathers' home.

There is magic in the title of "The Hill that Fell Down," by Miss Evelyn Sharp, who goes hand in hand with E. Nesbit among the best of children's story-tellers. And the magic would be all the more natural from this most intimate friend of fairies. But, as a matter of fact (horrible to talk of bare fact in the next sentence to fairies, but Miss Evelyn Sharp's fairies are so real!)—as a matter of fact, this is not a fairy-book at all. The hill that fell down is a real hill, and it really does fall down; the only magic is in the child's own mind, and it is a very beautiful sort of magic. The story tells how a whole big family of boisterous, laughing, happy-go-lucky cousins bursts in upon the lonely child's fairyland, and with what peculiar and delightful results. It is just a story of jolly children, and of one "queer child," as nurses say. But it is also another proof of the writer's peculiar gift. A lost child often does not cry while it is lost, but if it finds its mother or hears a kind word, then it cries; and Miss Evelyn Sharp can create that mood—that kind of appealing happiness—better than anyone. She compels the reader to share it.

Mr. E. V. Lucas, too, has a sure knowledge of the way to please a child. His collection, headed by "Anne's Terrible Good Nature," is as good a set of short stories for children as could be made. There is a fine variety about them, just as there is about children, and grown-up people will like to see one of our wittiest and most literary writers not being too witty or too literary for a child. This story-teller has the art of forgetting his clever friends, and he tells exactly the stories that children like, and in the right manner for minds of eight to twelve. Not that there is no wit. "Alice in Wonderland," the best of children's books, is also the wittiest. Only the wit is of the right kind, with nothing superior or sniffy or smart about it. Anne, who in her terrible good nature was always doing the most unfortunate and reprehensible things, that still turned out so much nicer than proper people's caution, is as lovable a child as could be created.

It seems a long way from Mr. Lucas's Kensington Gardens to the low hills of Zululand, but it is not very far for a child, and Zulu children are much the same as ours in mind, though some of their habits and customs would make the nursemaids jump. Mr. Dudley Kidd's "Bull of the Kraal," is a kind of children's edition of his "Savage Childhood." No writer has come closer to the heart of the South-East African native. There is nothing in the life and manners of that singularly fine race of men which Mr. Kidd does not know. He can tell us all about the children as well as about the warriors remaining from the great hosts that were so nearly invincible only thirty years ago. In this book he tells us of their daily life, their hunting, their fairy stories, their games and toys. Among the Zulus dolls are sometimes made of lumps of clay, but the mealie-cob or head of Indian corn is the commonest thing, and a first-rate doll it makes. No wonder the Zulu children firmly believe it is alive. Mr. Kidd says it is dressed in scraps of blanket and has hair of the same. But all through Central Africa you may find mealie-cob dolls with face, plaited hair, and dress (scanty dress, to be sure), all made of the covering leaf or husk that grows round the cob itself, and there is something simple and sufficient about that. If a boy, or a girl either, wants to get a real picture of ordinary savage life as it goes on from day to day without blood and slaughter, this is the book to read. It is full of knowledge, but all manner of amusement and delight as well.

For sharpness of contrast (remembering our point that no two children are in the least alike) let us put two girls' books next. To be sure, no girl would ever be limited to girls' books now. Girls have the universal suffrage for their own books and all others too. But after the Kaffir kraals, we get back to our own land in Mrs. Spielmann's "Margery Redford," and Mrs. Rankin's "Adopting of Rosa Marie." As Margery Redford is led on from childhood up to marriage and life in India, we must almost call her story a girl's novel—just the life of an English girl and happy woman. "Rosa Marie" has more variety in class and character, but remains a children's story all through.

Then, for boys, or at least for boys as well as girls, Mr. Marion Crawford brings out of his treasury "The Little City of Hope." Perhaps it is written for people of any age, for it is called "a Christmas story," and shows all the strong novelist's seriousness and mastery of style. But it might be best for a boy of fifteen or so—a sturdy kind of boy, fond of mechanics and capable of persistent sacrifice for an object. For it tells of an inventor's long and bitter struggle before the wonderful motor on which he had set his soul could be got to work, and in all the misery of that struggle the inventor has his son at his side to cheer him on and give up everything to make the wheel go round.

When we said that no two children were alike, of course, we know that in some things all boys and most girls are just the same, just as all people are the same in liking to eat and sleep. It is impossible, for instance, to imagine a human boy who never wanted to "run away." Men do not run away unless they are compelled, but every boy would run away unless he were compelled not to. So Mr. Lucas's "Runaways and Castaways" is quite sure of a great audience. It is not his own book, but a collection of some of the most exciting and delightful runaway stories in the world—English, French, and American stories, and all by just the first-rate people—Dickens, Mark Twain, Bret Harte, and Dumas. It is a perfect handbook to the art of running away.

For boys and girls who like their stories true and no mistake about it, Mrs. Andrew Lang has gathered up her beautiful "Book of Princes and Princesses," and got her husband to edit it. Again we come on a quality common to all children; all have wanted to be princes or princesses, and if they would look as nice as the pictures in this book, it is no wonder. The stories do not follow dates, for they begin with Napoleon and go back to the thirteenth century in Norway. But in England, France, Italy, and Germany, these people certainly once did live, and in this book we can watch them again moving about like the ghosts in the House of Arden. We see strange glimpses of girls and boys in the past, and we need not be called snobs for liking the gleam of their crowns and diadems.

A child never thinks history dull because it is true, but only if it is badly told. No one will think Mrs. Lang's book dull, but if a boy thirst for things that never were on land or sea, let him read Lord Dunsany's "Sword of Welleran." There he will dwell in a dreamland with monsters and strange shapes, and sometimes a spell of horror lies heavily over it all. It is a dreamland touched with terror, and has things in it beyond the thoughts of a child. But there are children who like thoughts beyond them, and enjoy terrors full of hidden intentions.

There is no terror about Mr. Kenneth Grahame's "Wind in the Willows," and though there is plenty of intention, it is not hidden. It is a story of the adventures of a Rat, a Mole, a Badger, and a Toad, and it might almost be called the Conversion of the Toad; for he was a very uppish fellow and a terrible motorist, till his companions took him in hand. Many and grievous were the perils and sufferings to which he had to submit before he could become a decent sort. Indeed, all the animals had a very stirring time, and but for their peculiar shapes they would well pass for first-rate human boys. It is one of the well-known advantages of childhood that the "animal kingdom" has no definite frontiers, but beasts and birds are at least as affable as men. But it is needless to praise a writer who is so secure in the front rank of those who can speak to children.

Mr. Farrow, great creator of the "Wallypug of Why," also tells of strange and interesting creatures that the dull grown-up has ceased to regard as human friends and brothers. "The Dwindleberry Zoo" is the story of a boy among owls and lobsters and frogs and foxes and geese and caterpillars and beetles and all manner of other nice things. And there is a lion who is King and keeps a Secretary-bird and a crocodile for Lord Chamberlain—a most varied and entertaining Court

Out of this lot, short as it is, there is plenty of choice for a fine variety of children. All the books are good, and some are best. But in the child's world parents still count, and the late Carl Ewald's book, "My Little Boy," is a book for parents. It is as charming a little book as could be written about a child; only, remember it is for the father and mother to read. They will enjoy it, and the pictures, too, for it is most beautifully illustrated.

Most of the books are well illustrated, and next to "My Little Boy," "The House of Arden," and "Princes and Princesses" are, perhaps, the finest in pictures.

H. W. Nevinson.

SCIENCE FOR THE YOUNG.*

(1) This book contains an account of the historical development of our knowledge of electricity and magnetism from the earliest times. A very few pages suffice to describe all that had been discovered before the time of that remarkable man, Dr. Gilbert, of Colchester, physician to Queen Elizabeth. It was he who first enunciated the truth that the earth must be regarded as a huge magnet, and thereby laid the foundation of the science of terrestrial magnetism. Progress, however, was exceedingly slow; nearly two hundred years elapsed from the time of Gilbert before the very first attempt to store electricity was made, by von Kleist, Bishop of Pomerania, who electrified some mercury placed in a bottle by leading into it a wire connected with a primitive kind of electrical machine. This arrangement was practically a Leyden jar, which is usually assumed to date a year after von Kleist's experiment, and is attributed to a professor at Leyden. The history of the steps of progress in electrical science, as told by Mr. Jenks, cannot fail to be of interest to the young reader.

Although this book deals almost entirely with the more practical part of our modern science (such as dynamos, motors, electric lighting, &c.), it contains a short sketch of electric waves and rays. Only once have we found in it any scientific inaccuracy; but that instance is a surprising one. On p. 219 it is stated that a dyne is a force which "propels one gramme one centimetre in one second"; and that a unit quantity of electricity is the "quantity conveyed by one dyne in one second"! How such errors were permitted we are at a loss to guess.

(2) This is an excellent treatise on a subject of universal interest. On every appliance used by the photographer Mr. Jenks gives ample information in very simple language, while in connection with each branch of it he relates the history of the steps by which each successive improvement was made. One of the most wonderful things in the whole range of Science is the story of the way in which a developer was discovered; and yet this story of the pure accident by which Daguerre made photography a possibility is not known to one photographer in ten thousand. The story of the "bewitched chamber" which contained the cup of mercury is told here, as it is also in Dr. Vogel's book on "Light and Photography."

The work contains innumerable hints and practical rules, as well as a valuable appendix on developers and other things.

We suggest a numerical correction on p. 214: the vibrations of red and blue light are 400 and 700 billions per second—not thousands of millions.

(3) Mr. Howden produces a book which will be a delight to the average British boy. It is full of beautiful photographs of ships in every stage of their construction, from the "Santa Maria" in which Columbus sailed to the Bahamas in 1492, to the most recent Atlantic liner. The book gives an interesting account of the ancient ships of Phœnicia, Egypt, Greece, and Rome, and a description of the way in which they were propelled. Some of these were very much larger than is commonly supposed, and capable of carrying hundreds of passengers: that which carried St. Paul to shipwreck near Malta carried 276. Noah's Ark is described as a three-decker "of registered tonnage 15,000." There is a chapter on the principles of ship design, in which the principles of stability are explained. It is related that in 1834 the first iron ship was built (by Laird at Birkenhead), to run between Limerick and Kilrush. She was driven ashore in a storm in company of a number of wooden ships; and her escape from injury, while the latter were wrecked, gave a great impetus to the building of iron ships; but, with the usual sluggish conservatism of such bodies, our Government departments were the last to be converted, and it was not until 1860 that the first iron ship for the Navy was built. All the details of paddle and screw propulsion are given and illustrated by excellent photographs, and nothing that can stimulate interest and knowledge is wanting. Warships, however, are not treated of—their complicated details rendering them unsuitable to the purpose of the book.

The Standard on—

"The best studies—for Englishmen—of the United States and France have been written by Englishmen. Mr. Bryce is admitted to have said practically the last word on the political and constitutional aspects of the United States, and Mr. Bodley has done a similar thing for France. . . . Many books, pamphlets and studies of Germany have appeared relating to nearly every aspect of her national life. We have no hesitation in describing and recommending Mr. Dawson's contribution in the book now before us as one of the most complete and satisfactory that has been presented to an English public. He has given us a most admirable picture, mainly, but not entirely, of the economic development of modern Germany. . . . Mr. Dawson has studied German life and conditions at first hand for more than twenty years."—The STANDARD. The most important book of the Year is W. Harbutt Dawson's.

London: GEORGE BELL & SONS, Portugal St., W.C.

(4) Treatises on geology are apt to be severely scientific, and, to the general reader, dull. This book is of a different kind. Roughly, it may be divided into two parts, the first dealing with the evolution of the physical features of the earth itself, and the second with the development of the successive kinds of its animal inhabitants. In the account of the latter an entertaining imagination is allowed to play, and we see the huge saurians of long past ages reproduced as they appeared in the flesh and as they fought for food. This characteristic of the book cannot fail to charm its readers—the young especially. In the University Museum at Oxford are exhibited a series of seven very large maps showing how this earth appeared in the periods of the Upper Carboniferous, the Upper Trias, and the Upper and Lower Jurassic. These are very striking pictures, and they show that in the Upper Trias the oceans and continents bore a strong resemblance to their present configurations, although in the Jurassic the likeness disappeared. A few pictures of this kind would impress the memory a hundredfold more effectually than any amount of literary description; and we would commend to Mr. Grew the adoption of such maps as an improvement in his charming book. One sentence gives us a feeling of regret: "The earth among all the heavenly bodies which we can examine at all closely is probably the only one on which life, as we know it, would have much chance of survival." The idea which is likely to result from this—guarded though the language is—is too much akin to Dr. Wallace's absurd contention that this earth is the only inhabited body in space, and it generates a deplorably narrow conception of the Universe.

(5) A more pleasing and truly scientific spirit is shown by Dr. Dolmage in his most interesting and popular book when he says: "Up to the present, we have not the slightest proof that life exists elsewhere than upon our earth. But who shall say that the twentieth century has not that in store for us, by which the presence of life in other orbs may be perceived through some form of vibration transmitted across illimitable space? . . . After the extraordinary revelations of the spectroscope—nay, after the astounding discovery of Röntgen—the word impossible should be cast aside, and inconceivability cease to be regarded as any criterion." This work places before the reader, in simple and untechnical language, all the striking facts of astronomy at present known, and is profusely illustrated with diagrams and photographs. The language at the end of p. 40 needs alteration, because it implies that the two equal and opposite pulls, which occur in the case of every revolving body, whatever its orbit, act upon the same body: otherwise the reference to a "balance" is meaningless. Of course, this equal-and-oppositeness of forces is a necessary law of all motion, and has nothing to say to the maintaining of a revolving body "at a regular distance." The fact that a balloon filled with hydrogen rises into the air (p. 156) is not by any means a proof that "hydrogen gas tends to fly away from our earth." Laplace could never have supposed that our original nebula, "perhaps by mutual gravitation among its parts, had acquired a motion of rotation in the same direction as the planets now revolve" (p. 333). The rotation could never have resulted from any internal forces. These inaccuracies do not, however, impair the essential merit of the book, which we recommend as an exceedingly entertaining and instructive exposition of every branch of astronomy.

SAFETY IN STORY BOOKS.*

I have often wondered why it is that when people buy books for boys they try to find something exciting, and when they buy books for girls they try to find something safe; but this curious system of selection seems to account for the difference that exists between the books that girls really like and the books that grown-up people try to make them like. It is difficult to see why there should be a separate standard of fiction for girls at all. No one can deny that some books are greater favorites with girls than with boys, just as, among the classics, some novels are greater favorites with women than with men. But the novels were written in the first place for men as well as women, and the selection was made naturally by the reader and not artificially by the author or publisher; and only when fiction for young people is written on the same principle will boys and girls stand some chance of getting what they like, as well as what they ought to like. As it is, the standard of conduct set up in their story books is bound to be a false one, because it rests on the assumption that life is always adventurous for boys and always safe for girls.

Girls' books to-day are happily less morbid and unreal than were those of an age that is dying; but this is rather due to the wider significance now given to the word "safe" than to any marked attempt to paint life as it is. In modern school stories both the improvement and its limitations are peculiarly evident. In the reaction against the old flabby ideals of girlhood, a tiresome emphasis is now laid upon the fact that girls are as brave and as honorable as their brothers; and one grows a little tired, in "A Plucky Schoolgirl," for instance, of the amazing exploits and triumphs of Terry Vaughan during her first term at school. By the time she has rescued the head girl from a burning room—the situation is just saved by the circumstance that it is not her worst enemy to whom she renders this service—the reader has begun to regret that the clever author of "Brown" should not have given us a more sincere picture of modern school life. The girls in "Dauntless Patty," by E. L. Haverfield, are well and naturally drawn, and their head mistress, following the fashion set in the newer kind of school story, is a human being instead of a prig; but the plot in this book also bears little relation to real life, and a very low level is reached, I think, when the incoming tide cuts off the heroine and the girl who has wronged her, and their reconciliation is effected simultaneously with the usual rescue by means of a rowing boat. We hark back to a still more artificial atmosphere in Mrs. L. T. Meade's new story, called "The School Favorite." Here we again have the account of somebody's first term—an extension of the time limit in school stories is sadly needed—and the theft of a valuable ring is the chief episode in it. The girls are of the kind who speak of one another as "darling" and "pet," and are apt to relapse into sobbing confessions; and, although the world of school does contain foolish people of this sort, one feels that Miss Ellsmere was singularly unfortunate in having no others at her school. The inevitable new girl, it is true, shows some spirit in the first chapter, but sobs and confesses with all the others in the last. Mrs. Molesworth is certainly old-fashioned in her methods; but she is rarely false to nature. If the trouble caused by the remarkable likeness between the two little girls in her story, "Sweet Content," does not quite convince the critical reader, the children who scamper through her pages are every bit as real as those we learned to love in "Carrots" long ago. Charley, the small boy who complains of having a birthday near Christmas, because it "muddles the presents," is a typical Mrs. Molesworth child.

"The Five Macleods," by Christina Gowans Whyte, rings true all through a somewhat lengthy, though wholly delightful, account of life in a small Scotch fishing village. There are adventures in it, and love stories, as well as modern ideas and ambitions; but, best of all, everybody whom we meet in this extremely healthy story is a real person, whether it is Lil, whose ambition it is to be grown-up, "so that she could wear eyeglasses and have two poached eggs for breakfast," or Miss Hoggerty, who is said by one of the children to have remarked that "no one thought of telling Joan of Arc that she wasn't a lady. They were just jolly glad to make use of her!"—or Elspeth, who goes away from home, with "six of everything" in her trunk, to discover that "the dreadful outside world is laughing at her loved little group of people and friends." I may be mistaken, because it is always dangerous for a grown-up person to make predictions about the schoolroom; but I fancy that if "The Five Macleods" had not been labelled a girls' book, natural selection would have made it a boys' book too, simply because it tells a jolly story about jolly people in a natural way.

At this time of day, I refuse to believe that anybody wants to read about a little boy with "exquisite fair, curly hair, and eyes like mosaics of lapis lazuli, and wistful red lips," who dies crying out "The light—the light—and the angels!" or about a heroine who rejects a Lord Francis in order to marry a simple countryman, who presses his lips upon the rail where her hand has often lain, and conveniently inherits a fortune in time to lay it at her feet on the wedding day. There is plenty of this sort of thing for those who do like it, in "The Red Light," by C. E. C. Weigall. "Cousin Sara," by Rosa Mulholland, belongs to a much higher order of romance, and the people in it are sufficiently living to suffer by contrast with the rather conventional setting in which they find themselves. The rise of the hero from being a penniless youth, suspected of theft, to be a famous painter, his marriage with the heroine who has always believed in him, and his forgiveness of the villain who owns up to the robbery on his deathbed, suggest well-worn themes that are unworthy of so careful a writer as Lady Gilbert. But the heroine has a fine scientific intellect as well as great beauty; and that is a step in the right direction in a novel for girls. "Daughters of the Dominion," by Bessie Marchant, is a thoroughly entertaining story of a Canadian girl, who is left to make her own way in the world and does it to the accompaniment of adventures that never stray beyond the limits of probability. The story goes straight ahead and holds the reader to the last page, giving incidentally a picture of Canadian life that alone will interest many.

In the end, though, one always feels that fiction, even good fiction, will not stand a chance in the schoolroom against fact, when fact is of the right sort. And it is decidedly the right sort in Canon Dawson's fascinating studies of women who have really lived; and, in spite of a dull-sounding title, I think "Heroines of Missionary Adventure" will put many novels into the shade this Christmas. It is full of little human and humorous touches, and not the least interesting study in the book is that of A. L. O. E., familiar to all those among us who were brought up on Mid-Victorian story books—the lady who "had a perfect genius for games of all sorts," and a power of attracting boys, especially the native boys of Batala, of whom this Lady of England remarked ingenuously, "They think that ours must be a very pleasant genial kind of religion, connected in some way with singing, cricket, and kindness." Here, at all events, is a book that girls will like, and also a book that girls are likely to receive at the hands of the most cautious grown-up person. For it is written by a Canon, and no one will question its "safety."

FAIRIES.*

AMONG what Charles Lamb so happily called the "classics of the nursery," the fairy-tale has a secure and honored place. The heaven that lies about us in our infancy is a heaven peopled by dwarfs and giants, hidden treasures and beautiful princes; a heaven where birds, beasts, insects, and even trees and flowers, speak our language, and where all things animate or inanimate conspire together to help or hinder the fortunes of the hero, who is, of course, ourselves.

"Shades of the prison house begin to close and these lively shapes give way to the more mundane forms of Indians and trappers, highwaymen, pirates, midshipmen, mutineers, and detectives. But for most of us the fairy-tale is the pleasant vehicle that first carried us along the roads of romance and into the land of enchantment. Of late years some modern educational authorities have banded themselves together, saying with Mr. Gradgrind, "What I want, sir, is facts," and decreeing the banishment of the fairy-tale. But the realm of the fairy is quite secure from invasion by any two-power or twenty-two-power combination of "improving" books. "Think," says Lamb, writing to Coleridge, "what you would have been now if, instead of being fed with tales and old wives' fables in childhood, you had been crammed with geography and natural history!"

The taste of "the hesitating purchaser" to whom Stevenson addressed the lines inscribed on the first page of "Treasure Island" is rigidly conservative; nor can we blame him. He agrees with Hazlitt that books, unlike women, are none the worse for being old, and he is faithful to his favorites. Accordingly, a new edition of "Grimm's Fairy Tales" may be expected every Christmas, and this year it comes from Messrs. Cassell, with charming illustrations by Mr. J. R. Monsell. The brothers Grimm have delighted many generations of children, and it is certain that their fairy-tales will preserve their memory when a work of which they thought far more highly—the great "Deutsches Worterbuch"—is forgotten. A book of a different type which has also won its place as a children's classic is Kingsley's fairy tale for a land baby, "The Water Babies." It is published by Messrs. Dent in most attractive form, with an introduction by Miss Rose Kingsley, and illustrations in color by Miss Margaret Tarrant which are the best we have seen. Miss Kingsley tells us that the book was the outcome of a gentle reminder, at breakfast one spring morning, that as Kingsley's three elder children had their book—"The Heroes"—the baby, then four years old, "must have his." Kingsley made no answer, but went at once to his study, and came back in an hour "with the first chapter of 'The Water Babies' in his hand, written exactly as it stands. At this pace and with the same ease the whole book was composed."

The Countess Martinengro Cesaresco's "The Fairies' Fountain and Other Stories," has grace and fancy, but we think the author would have done better had she not occasionally tried to be funny. The changeling who takes little Gisbert's appearance is also disappointing. His purpose is to be thoroughly naughty, but with the resources of fairy-land at his disposal he might have done something much worse. We object also to the intrusion of science in the form of the four great blocks of radium that light up the Mole's dining-room in "The Princess and the Milkmaid," though in other respects this is the best tale in the collection. "Legends from Fairyland" is a volume of stories allegorical in character, combining the machinery of the fairy tale with the personification of vices such as mischief, spite, idleness, and so forth. The stories are well told, and will be enjoyed by children who skip introductions, or who, after reading that by Miss Effie H. Freemantle, have courage enough to proceed farther. "Dear little children, be pure

¶ The season of present-giving is near, and you are sure to be told: "Get a few story-books for the youngsters. You know what to get." But, unfortunately, on entering the bookseller's shop, you become bewildered at the immense array of books before you. Why not know beforehand something about the books you mean to look at.

¶ Messrs. BLACKIE & SON specialise in books for young people, and they want to save you time and trouble. They have just published a beautiful catalogue of their recent juvenile books with a synopsis of plots and many specimen illustrations in colour. If you send a postcard with your address they will send you a copy. You can then mark your list, and take it or send it to your bookseller, and you will really get the books that you want.

as the lilies, sweet as the rose, gentle as the butterflies, and, above all, soar with the lark." This may be excellent in a sermon, but is quite the wrong way to introduce a collection of fairy-tales. As a specimen of the way in which the characters are personified, we quote from a description of a trial in Sheneland:—

> "When the Guards arrived with their prisoners, the Grand Hall of Justice was crowded with everybody then at Court. Fairy Queen was seated on her Golden Throne, with Prince Goldheart beside her, and Judge Grim on her left hand. Prince Glee and the two Maids of Honour were accommodated with stools on the second step of the Dais, and Princess Trill was supported by Mother Dignity in the background.
> "The seven prisoners, Spite, Mischief, Slander, Sneer, Gossip, Idlewords, and Twaddle, were ordered to mount upon the platform of Shame, that they might be seen of all the Court, and the grand Pomp having proclaimed silence, Specs, the Public Accuser, read the indictment, which charged them with having gathered fuel, piled it up in a stack, kindled it into a blaze, and then fanned up a great fire on the shores of Sheneland, in the wicked design of blackening three of Fairy Queen's loyal subjects: to wit, Prince Glee, and the fair Maids of Honour Clipsome and Touchy. Further, the indictment charged them with an attempt to make dissension between true lovers, which attempt was the most aggravated form of High Treason recognised by the laws of Sheneland, and deserving of the punishment of DEATH."

The allegory is, of course, inspired by Bunyan, but it is capably managed, and most children are fond of allegory.

Mr. Andrew Lang having exhausted all the colors of the rainbow and several others in the titles of his fairy books does not give us one this year, though he has assisted Mrs. Lang in another sort of book for children which we notice elsewhere. In the meantime others are following his example and presenting us with specimens of the folk-lore of various countries chosen rather for their power to please than for any scientific value they may possess. Thus during the present year there have appeared collections of Celtic, Russian, Jewish, and South African fairy-tales, many of them variants of stories to be found in our own fairy mythology, and nearly all having the simplicity and freshness of literature that springs from the people. Of the three collections of Celtic tales before us that of Miss Elizabeth Grierson's is the best and fullest. Mr. W. B. Yeats has told us that once when he asked an old man in County Sligo if he had ever seen a fairy, "Amn't I annoyed with them?" was the reply, and this way of looking upon them as quite normal and as likely to be expected as any natural event, while running through all folk-lore, is especially characteristic of the Celtic races. Miss Grierson has shown great skill in preserving the spirit of the old traditions. Her rendering of the legend of "The Children of Lir," who were changed into swans by the enchantments of a wicked stepmother, is excellent in its mingling of sternness and sympathy. The three children were compelled to "live three hundred years on smooth Lough Darva, and three hundred years on the Sea of Moyle, and three hundred years on the troubled sea between Irros Domnum and Innisgloria, until the days come when Largnen, Prince of the North, shall wed with Decca, Princess of the South, and a new teacher shall arise, even St. Patrick, who shall come to Erin, bringing with him the light of a pure gospel." But they are allowed to keep their own speech and their human reason so that they are able to have conversations with their father who comes to the borders of the lake on which they live, and they are gifted with "the power of singing plaintive faerie music, the most beautiful music in the whole world, which lulls all who listen to it to the most peaceful sleep." Two of Mr. Hannon's four "Munster Fairy Tales for Old and Young" are reprinted from the "Folk-Lore Journal." They were taken down by the author, when a boy of twelve, from the lips of an old man of his acquaintance, and preserve all the quaintness and unexpected turns of phrasing that gives so great a charm to an Irish peasant's speech. "Fairy Tales from South Africa," collected from native sources by Mrs. E. J. Bourhill and Mrs. J. B. Drake, and "The Russian Fairy Book," translated by Mr. N. H. Dale, are additions to fairy literature of real value. To write a good fairy tale might seem an easy task did we not remember the number of failures, and in these old stories we find a quality which the best modern imitations do not possess. The translators of both books are to be congratulated on the way in which they have rendered the simple directness of their originals while at the same time retaining just the right amount of foreign atmosphere. Of the two, we think "The Russian Fairy Book" will find most favor among English children.

"Jewish Fairy Tales and Fables," by Aunt Naomi, contains upwards of a dozen little stories taken from the Talmud and the Midrash. It seems to be primarily intended for Jewish children, and the central allegory of each story "has been left unsullied to convey the beautiful moral as intended by the great Rabbis who invented them." We have not been able to follow the allegory in every case, but this does not diminish our enjoyment of the stories. They have a vein of sly fun which is sure to delight children, and such tales as "The King, the Queen, and the Bee," or "The Man Who was a Hundred Years Young," are likely to become favorites.

BACK TO THE PAST.*

Recent years have brought about many developments in the world of books for boys and girls. They are, among other things, more artistically illustrated; and the average of literary quality has certainly improved. One notices these improvements particularly in the case of boys' books, which have advanced immeasurably since Henty wrote his first historical romance and Dean Farrar set the fashion in moral school stories. Henty is still read, as this season's edition of "A Jacobite Exile," among a crowd of more up-to-date works, amply proves, and "Eric" probably remains an unforgotten classic for a certain kind of boy. But the tendency, on the whole, is towards a class of book that is intelligible to the boy, and at the same time not uninteresting to the more mature reader. In other words, the boundary line between the boy's book and that of the grown-up is being eliminated. We are not sure that this elimination is altogether a good thing; but it is a fact that has become more and more patent in recent years.

One important feature in connection with this season's output of boys' books should not be overlooked. This is the triumph of the historical romance over the school story. Out of the fairly representative batch of books under review, a great number are frankly historical romance, and the rest, with a couple of exceptions, more or less so. Let us take as the first, and one of the best, Mr. Herbert Strang's "Barclay of the Guides." The story has the Siege of Delhi for a background. The hero, James Barclay, whose father has been massacred in a Sikh rebellion, is abducted when a child by the chief of a hill tribe and brought up as that chief's adopted son, being given the name of Ahmed. After an apprenticeship to war in the form of inter-tribal conflicts between his adopted father, Rahmut, and a rival chieftain, Minghal, he visits Peshawar and gains admittance to the ranks of Lumsden's Guides. He is subsequently engaged in a series of perilous missions to Delhi, is for some time imprisoned in a house by this hereditary enemy, Minghal, and finally takes part in the grand assault on the city. In due course he hears of the inevitable property awaiting him in England, and goes over to take possession thereof, but shortly returns to active service as a lieutenant in the British Army, and culminates an adventurous career by winning the V.C. The narrative teems with exciting episodes; incidentally it imparts a good deal of information regarding a momentous period in our history. It is Mr. Strang at his best, and that is very good indeed. From the same author's pen is a late-seventeenth-century romance, entitled "Humphrey Bold." Humphrey is a Shrewsbury lad, who, being jockeyed out of his inheritance, takes the road to Bristowe with the intention of joining a ship; arrives at that port after sundry chances and mischances; finds himself kidnapped and forced to serve on an English privateer; makes the acquaintance of a French prison, from which he conducts a daring and ingenious escape; and, after many thrilling adventures in the West Indies, returns to peace, prosperity, and happiness in his native land. The narrative is given in the first person, and is finely illustrated in color by Mr. W. H. Margetson; the get-up of the book, indeed, is almost that of an édition de luxe. Next comes a story by Captain F. S. Brereton. A young backwoodsman, Steve Mainwaring by name, is the central figure of "How Canada was Won"—a tale of the struggle between France and England in the New World, that ended with the capture of Quebec. The tale includes many lively encounters between those favorite old protagonists, the Redskin and the Paleface; while a sinister French villain, one Jules Lupon, intermittently crosses the path of Steve till he meets with poetic justice. Perhaps the powder within the jam, otherwise the history within the narrative, is not quite so craftily disguised as in Mr. Strang's stories, but it is palatable enough not to be resented. Another well-known writer, Mr. Harry Collingwood, is the author of "Blue and Grey: A Story of the American Civil War." In this, John Hamilton Howard, aged eighteen, leaves his home in Alabama to fight for the Southern States against the North. His youth is seemingly no bar to his getting a commission and a command at an early stage, and after sundry adventures and narrow escapes from the villain of the piece—a cousin who wants his property—he emerges as one of the dauntless survivors on the "Alabama" after her fight with the "Kearsage."

Very few writers of historical romance for boys go further back than the seventeenth century for their periods, and Mr. George Surrey is exceptional in that he has chosen the time of Charles Bourbon's Sack of Rome for the setting of his Italian tale, entitled "Mid Clash of Swords." Wilfrid Salkeld, his hero, is a knight-errant English youth, who, besides being possessed of a bull-headed bravery, excels in every imaginable feat of arms. His encounters with German mercenaries, and with the Florentine nobles attached to the Court of Giuliano de' Medici, are excellent reading. Eventually he wins through and escapes to England. The book is interesting—apart from its fighting properties—as a study of Italian turbulence and craft. We come back to more familiar ground in "The Goldsmith of Chepe," by Mr. Tom Bevan, a tale of the Plague Year, wherein Master Eli Hodgson relates his adventures. He tells us of his coming to his uncle Puddifoot, a goldsmith in plague-stricken London; and shows how fate and that same uncle were responsible for his sojourning, first in a thieves' Alsatia in the City; secondly, in a vessel manned by cut-throats; and thirdly, in the county of Dorset. As the henchman of Mistress Bampfylde of Clifdon, he helps to foil the evil machinations of his quondam Alsatian associates, and finally returns to London, where the goldsmith's business and a fortune await him. The rush to Klondike has now become a matter of history, and "The White Trail," by Mr. Alexander Macdonald, the well-known author and traveller, may therefore be included in this section. In this is traced the career of Archibald Ralston, from the time that he left his home in Glasgow to when he returned, a successful seeker after gold, from Klondike. How he made friends with two Scotch adventurers, and, in consequence of a mishap that befell him at the start, was persuaded to share their journey down the Yukon to Dawson City; how the party found gold; and how he played an important part in the historic exodus of miners from Dawson City; all this is contained in a narrative bristling with exciting adventures. Mr. Macdonald's description of that fateful frozen land is powerful in the extreme, and the record of half-civilised adventurers it attracts makes a grim picture only relieved by human touches of rugged sentiment and kindly humor. Historical, also, in much the same sense, is "Captain Jack O'Hara," a tale of the modern navy, by Mr. Percival Lancaster. Many of the episodes narrated in this book are based on facts, and the facts include such up-to-date ones as the voyage of the Russian fleet to its doom at Admiral Togo's hands, the destruction of the "Hainan" by Chinese pirates, and certain minor operations in Somaliland. The gunboat "Windrush," commanded by O'Hara, carries a crew who will go anywhere and do anything on sea or land; and their adventures in the Indian Ocean and the China Seas include everything in the way of fighting, bloodshed, tight corners, and so forth, that a boy could wish to read about. Mr. S. W. Hunter's illustrations are admirable, moreover. A book that may be compared to this, in regard to giving one's money's worth of adventure, is a new edition of Dr. Gordon Stables' "Courage, True Hearts."

This brings us to two stories that have a touch of the supernatural about them. "The Golden Girdle," by Lieut.-Colonel A. F. Mockler-Ferryman, tells how Walter Henderson is entrusted by his uncle (of the British Museum) with the task of finding the Girdle of Sophana, the Great Queen of Babylon, and adding it to our existing stock of national antiques. The journeyings of the intrepid girdle-seeker and his friend across Babylonian deserts, their Bedouin friends and enemies, their many disappointments, and finally the single-handed capture of the Golden Girdle itself by Henderson, are described in these exciting pages; and the element of mystery is supplied by the magic and seemingly destructive properties of the Golden Girdle itself—properties which, of course, don't operate when the hero gets hold of the bauble. Here again the author has been fortunate in his illustrator, Mr. Allan Stewart. Mr. Frank Powell's "The Wolf-Men" is described as a tale of amazing adventure in the under-world. The under-world is reached by a small party on a submarine, who set out to find the North Pole, and ultimately land in a country inhabited by a most objectionable race of savages, not to mention such survivals as the ichthyosaurus, the megalosaurus, the giant spider, and a full-blown wizard. After being threatened with annihilation at least once in every six pages, they get home—taking a tame giant with them—in time to confute a house-party of rival scientists who are disposed to sneer at the account of their journey. There is a thrill in every other paragraph.

The remaining book on our list is less wonderful than this one, but better adapted to the requirements of nervous readers. The story in "That Master of Ours," by the author of "Dorrincourt," "Expelled," &c., is told by the son of an eighteenth-century Cornish farmer. The breezy Cornish atmosphere of "Expelled" is reproduced here in all its delightful freshness. In William Strange, the first schoolmaster in Redruth, called thither owing to a serious outburst of youthful lawlessness, we have the embodiment of the Wesleyan revivalist; and the moral of the tale is the triumph of his strength of character over his physical weakness, in face of difficulties with turbulent pupils and more turbulent parents, that would have appalled many a more muscular man. The narrative moves with a swing, is free from mawkishness, and bristles with points of vivid characterisation.

THE WAY OF ALL FLESH. New Edition. 6s.

The Times says:—"It looks as though Samuel Butler were at last beginning to come into his own. . . . Almost everything he wrote is incessantly alive and stimulating; and now that his books have begun to make their way beyond the small circle which has always known and prized them, it is likely that they will be very rapidly and widely appreciated."

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A SUPER-TRAMP. Preface by Bernard Shaw. 6s. [Second Edition

The Daily Chronicle says of Nature Poems:—"It was impossible for Mr. Davies or any man living to improve upon the best work in his 'Soul's Destroyer.' But these 'Nature Poems' show that, without losing any of his incomparable freshness, he is becoming more critical. This is his finest book. . . He has found himself, and has been divinely gifted with a power of expression equal to that of any other man of our day. . . Blake and John Clare and Chalkhill sounded the same notes, and so did Herrick. But has any of these men written more perfectly?"

CONCERNING CHRIST; Sonnet and Song. Cloth gilt, gilt top. 1s. net. Postage 3d.

The Birmingham Post says:—"Both sonnets and lyrics are full of fervour and reverence. They have individuality and sincerity."

The Catholic Herald says:—"This sonnet sequence on the life of our Lord reaches a very high level of religious poetry, and seems to be inspired by sincere religious feeling. To attain success in religious poetry is a difficult achievement, and, though we cannot say the author consistently rises to the height of her theme, yet in some of her sonnets she undoubtedly gives us genuine poetry."

tendency to let fresh air into the nursery; to take the class to the hillside; to encourage original research in hedge-row, lane and field. Our only rather timorous hope is that the growth of nature study will for long be disguised as an enlargement of the play-hour rather than an addition to the time given to lessons. That being understood, we are glad to consider a small pile of Christmas gift-books that have been set aside as having relation to the outdoor world.

Selma Lagerlof wrote the "Wonderful Adventures of Nils" on commission for the Swedish National Teachers' Association. They are now translated in English, or rather American, by Velma Swanston Howard. The author is said to have spent three years in nature study with a single eye to this task. She carries her knowledge well, for there is nothing didactic, or in the least pedantic, in the book, and her nature study has not prevented her from the delightful, if daring, expedient of turning Nils into an elf, so that he may the better observe the manners and customs of his little brothers—the animals and birds. The wild geese pass over head, and the white gander attempts to join them. Nils, forgetting his diminutive size, tries to save his father's property by flinging himself on the gander's neck, with the result that he, as well as "Morten Goosey Gander," goes off with the wild geese. They get a view of nearly all the cities of Sweden, including some that are buried or in ruins, visit historic castles and lonely farm-houses, and at Karlskrona the statue of Charles XI. descends from its pedestal and takes Nils round the naval museum and dock-yards. But best of all are the doings of this wild, free flock of geese. At the great stork dance on Kullaberg (a magnificent natural ceremony), Smirre, the fox, breaks truce, and is expelled from his country, and goes wandering north. He tracks the geese, and moves all his wild kindred to climb or swim to their well-chosen roosting places and murder them in their sleep. Thanks to Thumbietot, vice Nils, his attempts fail always by an exciting margin. The picture of the wild and other country over which the geese fly is very inspiring, and the ways of the geese and other creatures are described with a freedom that hides study. We give one small passage to show how much on the other side of things the author has managed to get:—

> "He heard a couple of loud shots, and saw two white smoke-columns ascend.
> "There was a sudden awakening, and an unrest among the birds. 'Hunters, hunters,' they cried. 'Fly high, fly high.'
> "The nearest bird-flocks hadn't noticed them in time. They had flown too low. Several dark bodies sank down towards the sea; and for every one that fell, there arose cries of anguish from the living.
> "The wild geese got safely out of the way, but the boy couldn't get over his amazement. 'To think that anyone could wish to shoot upon such as Akka and Yksi and Kaksi and the goosey-gander and the others. Human beings had no conception of what they did.'"

Mr. A. J. Dawson's story of "Finn the Wolfhound" is, if not for all time, for every age. Thrilling dog-fights and hunting scenes form the least part of it. In the early life of Finn, and the story of Tara, his mother, before him, we have many secrets of kennel management presented to us in the guise of an epic. Plenty of food rightly administered, clean conditions, fresh air, and exercise, are fairly certain talismans for creating a big Irish wolfhound with plenty of bone. We find ourselves wondering who will see that the same factors are given to the stunted children of our town populations. But the story whirls us on to a triumphant debut at the show-bench, then to the dirt and cruelty of a dog-stealer's home, and to the still greater barbarity of a circus, where Finn is mistaken for a wolf, to be cowed with red-hot bars and a lead-butted whip. How gloriously the fresh air breaks in again when Finn breaks out and goes off to play his part among the strange denizens of the Australian Bush. There we must leave our readers to find him and enjoy, as we did, his further exploits and their triumphant conclusion.

Some place the magic of romance higher than the magic of clairvoyance, that can call back whole volumes of entertaining fact, if only one solid reminder be present. That is the method successfully employed by Lilian Gask in "Wonders of the Zoo." A boy named Geoff has the advantage of visiting the Zoo in company with the Colonel—a tactful raconteur of animal stories, and one who has had some experience among the big carnivores and others in their wild homes. We can imagine the lions blinking their yellow eyes as the boy looks at them, and understands more and more what terrible fellows they are, till the bars vanish and the big grass jungles of Africa take their place, and one has to fight for his life with the maned man-eater. By the way, the Colonel is a little at variance with Selous and others when he makes the lion roar while hunting, and he might have been led to enquire more closely into the facts by this observation of his: "It is a curious fact, but when in captivity lions roar more after they have been fed than at any other time." But he is well up in the lore of the Zoo, and in the ways generally of the wild animals whose shadows are encaged there; and we do not think there is a better book to be read as an introduction to a really interesting visit to that Mecca of the young naturalist. And now comes one who attempts greater magic still—that of resuscitating an existence millions of years past, on the strength of a chipped flint or a dried apple recovered from a Lake dwelling. We refer to "Days Before History," wherein H. R. Hall alternates stories of an antediluvian named Tig and the commentaries of some modern boys. It is an illuminating book, and we can quite imagine the boys setting out to make for themselves cave dwellings, primitive pottery, flint arrows, fire drills, and the other first-hand contrivances that bring us far nearer to the realities than the factory products of to-day. The stories are sometimes of animals, sometimes of primitive hunters, potters, agriculturists, and, dry as the subject is usually voted by the young, we think that a perusal of this book will alter their opinion.

But enough now of the magic of the object-lesson. The actualities of animal life, told in the usual book-form, are perfectly interesting, as Mr. John Lea abundantly shows in "The Romance of Bird Life." It is a great volume, as readers of the series know, but the subject is more than extensive enough to fill it. Are there not cuckoos that get other birds to hatch their eggs, megapodes that make incubators and trouble no one to sit for them, hoatzins that are hatched four-footed, birds that can fly as soon as hatched, birds that cheep within the egg, and specific marvels of many other kinds? There is a book full of them to be found, and Mr. Lea has found most of the more interesting. He also gives us hundreds of stories of individual sagacity, bravery, foresight, and other traits that make birds the most human of the animals. It is certainly one of the best of that long and useful "Romance" series.

Two books from Messrs. Dent illustrate the limits of the children's realm. In "Animals at Home," Mr. Percival Westell tells us that he has adopted "the somewhat novel method for each animal to tell its own life-history." Accordingly we have the frog, for example, opening thus: "If you look at my picture, which was taken by a very clever photographer"—. Animal autobiography is so difficult that most writers have given it up altogether. If animal talking has to be indulged in, we think it should be confined to words of one syllable and to sentences of not more than six words. Animals that talk Greek and metaphysics are as dull as a game without rules—except, of course, mock-turtles, gryphons, and a few others. On the other hand, Professor Ainsworth Davis' "Nature Study" is a rather severe reader for higher classes. It covers the whole field of nature study, and though the printer has done his best, by means of black print and short paragraphs, to cheer the reader on, the journey is a stiff one. The writer is too sparing of his words, covering some teeming subjects with cryptic sentences that almost hide the contents. Lastly, we are very glad to recommend to our readers the "Dwellers" Series, published by Messrs. Jack. The pond, the meadow, the wood, the garden, and other habitats, are covered in separate volumes, which can be had in cloth for a shilling, or in paper for sixpence. There are plenty of black-and-white and colored illustrations, and the text is perfectly attractive and informing. On the one hand, there are few adults, except those expert in natural history, who will not find something to learn in any one of the volumes, and, on the other hand, everything is perfectly accessible to the youngest understanding. The proudest child cannot imagine himself being "talked down to," nor can the stupidest wonder whether the writer is talking about anything real or only spinning words. The Rev. Theodore Wood is the author of these booklets. We sincerely congratulate him on the simplicity, dignity and effectiveness of his English.

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

Two hundred and twenty-three members of the Liberal Parliamentary Party, acting through Sir John Brunner, have presented to the Prime Minister a memorial reminding him of Gladstone's last warning in 1894, that the situation between the Lords and the Commons—the "tremendous contrariety and incessant conflict upon matters of high principle and profound importance"—could no longer continue, and asking that effect be given to it "at the earliest possible moment." Twenty-five other members subscribe to the memorial, but, desiring to leave the Cabinet full discretion, do not adopt the words "at the earliest possible moment." The Labor and the Nationalist members were not asked to sign, but are, of course, in full sympathy, so that the great majority of the party are already committed to an opening of the inevitable conflict with the Lords. Time, of course, must be given to develop the agitation, but not a day should be lost in organising and starting it. We believe this course to be in harmony with the reports which many agents are furnishing, and the state of feeling in the country.

Mr. Wyndham made a valuable statement at Liverpool on Wednesday of the general lines of the plan of the Preferential Protectionists whom Mr. Balfour and he will support, as against the Protectionists on the American pattern who run the Tariff Reform League. He proposed three taxes—two shillings a quarter on foreign grain and flour, a tax on foreign meat, and a tax on foreign wood. Colonial products were, of course, to be exempt. These tidings of joy to the British consumer appear to be almost entirely meant for the gratification of the Canadian farmer and cattle breeder. Mr. Wyndham explained that the foreigner would pay all these taxes, and that the price of the commodities would not rise, but might even fall. If so, there can be no benefit to the home farmer, and no new opportunity for the colonial grower.

On Friday week, as we have already stated, the Prime Minister announced the withdrawal of the Education Bill, a proceeding which, if it was a little swift and summary, was a clear consequence of the hostile debates and decisions at the Church Council. On Monday, the Prime Minister pronounced, with much feeling, a funeral oration. It was clear, he said, in face of the Bishop of Salisbury's resolution, which declined to accept the Bill "without serious amendment," and was met by still more hostile motions, that none of the Church interests concerned accepted the compromise. He justly praised Mr. Runciman's pursuit of peace and his fine temper and skill, paid a like tribute to Dr. Davidson, whom he called "a great Archbishop"—a true "pastor pastorum"—and added that he had experienced the heaviest disappointment of his political life. Mr. Balfour, who has throughout been a chief instrument in the wrecking of the Bill, retorted by attributing its loss to the Government's haste in the House of Commons, and to their proposing an "agreed" Bill before a perfectly closed settlement on the financial question had been arrived at with the Primate.

On the other side, the Archbishop has written to say that he was always willing that contracted-out schools should be the exception rather than the rule, and that the Church should make a "substantial" contribution to their maintenance. He added that he and other Bishops would not have supported the specific amendments to the Bill proposed in the Bishop of Salisbury's motion. It is a pity that these excellent ideas were lost sight of when the demand was made for an extra seven shillings a child, and when the Bishop of Salisbury's motion was framed. We are bound to say that a grave point of criticism also arises in the failure of the Education Department to supply at once exact statistics, giving the cost per child in Church, Catholic, and Wesleyan schools, and the number of teachers and children in each class of school. We hope that Mr. Runciman, now that his hands are free, will look into this serious matter of the preparation of educational statistics, and of the way in which educational policy is affected by it.

On Wednesday Mr. Asquith collected and counted the salvage from the wrecks of this long Session. All the greater non-financial measures, save the Irish University Bill—the Licensing, Education, and Scottish Valuation Bills—have been abandoned. The Housing Bill, which should have been far simpler and stronger, is to be remodelled and passed, if possible, early next year. The Children's Bill and the Prevention of Crime Bill, good minor measures with doubtful points, are saved, and, judging from Mr. Balfour's speech on the report of the Eight Hours Bill for Miners, there is a chance—not a brilliant one—that this long-vexed subject may pass into law, subject to the five years' delay the Government has provided for it. The Port of London Bill may be destroyed in the Lords, though nearly every section of opinion in the House of Commons supports it.

The report stage of the Eight Hours Bill for Miners has seen an almost complete reversion of the Tory Party to the line of pure resistance, broken by Mr. Chamberlain's and Lord Randolph Churchill's support of this measure. Protectionists like Mr. Bonar Law, whose policy involves an artificial increase of the cost of living, expressed particular aversion to a rise in the price of coal produced by State action. All these arguments, and the set of abstract questions addressed by Mr. Balfour, find an exact and fair rejoinder in the report of Mr. Rea's Committee. For the rest, the chief aim of the Opposition was to revive the objection to the Bill of the miners of Durham and Northumberland, now withdrawn as the result of their adhesion to the Miners' Federation. We strongly hope that if the Bill is mutilated in the Lords, the Government will stand absolutely firm in refusing to accept a single amendment.

The opening of the Turkish Parliament has been fixed for Thursday, and the Sultan will open Parliament in person at Stamboul. The deputies have been gathering in Constantinople for some days, but the party constitution of the Chamber and even the number of members are not yet clear, partly because not all the elections have finished—the Constantinople results, for instance, which involve several members of the Ministry and several leaders of the Young Turks, are not yet announced—and partly because, until the House has been at work some time, party groups are not likely to crystallise definitely. Nobody knows exactly what has happened in Asiatic Turkey outside the ports, but the general results for European Turkey and the ports can be gathered. Here the Reform party has undoubtedly elected most of its nominees, who are not exclusively Turks, or even Moslems. Every nationality has secured some representatives. The Bulgarians have done worst of all, having elected only two of their people, as one result of the declaration of independence; the Greeks have done better, but they have split with the Turks, who, on the other hand, co-operated with the Armenians and the Jews during the voting. The Senate, whose members must not be more in number than a third of the Chamber, and who are nominated for life, have not yet been selected.

Mr. Roosevelt's last annual message was read to Congress on Tuesday, and, although in phraseology a little less exuberant than its predecessors, it retains the characteristic commonplaces at their customary length. Mr. Roosevelt once more chastises the piratical capitalist and the Socialist and sings the praises of the "decent man." He once more urges regulation, not destruction, of trusts, and contends that only the National Government is competent to deal with forces of national extent. He repeats his recommendations of factory legislation for the protection of women and children, and of compensation for injured workers, and, while resisting the trade union claim for the abolition of injunctions, admits that the present practice of the courts inflicts substantial injustice upon workmen. All this is familiar; it has appeared in the same vague general form in previous messages, has never been put in the form of precise proposals, and has, therefore, led to no tangible result, except, perhaps, as an American paper suggests, by its explosiveness "frightening the country into paying little attention." Somewhat less familiar are Mr. Roosevelt's blunt words about the "marked inefficiency" of the judges in dealing with corporations.

Prince Buelow's speech in the Reichstag on Monday on foreign affairs was happily conceived. He expressed his cordial sympathy with the new movement in Turkey, and his confidence in its success, and denied the assertion that the revolution was likely to, or had in fact, damaged Germany's interests or prestige in Turkey. That, we think, depends on whether Germany will change for the better the general character of her very cynical commercial policy in Turkey. Germany's attitude towards the Bosnian complications, said Prince Bülow, was governed by a determination to let other more directly interested Powers take the lead in the work of reconstructing the Berlin Treaty, and to stand by her ally Austria, though she accepted no responsibility for her policy. Prince Bülow's reference to the Casa Blanca affair was accurate and candid, and distinguished by a significant protest against "a futile and petty prestige policy." It is heartily received by the French Press, though he made the significant admission that the Moroccan problem has not yet exhausted its difficulties. The Japanese-American Alliance was warmly approved, as embodying the principles of Germany's policy—the status quo and the open door—and Prince Bülow pointed out that Germany has had a practically identical arrangement with Japan since 1900. Towards Great Britain the Chancellor was equally sympathetic. The two countries, he emphasised, were in no sort of competition in Turkey. The German Government reciprocated the good-will expressed by Mr. Asquith at the Guildhall.

On Thursday Prince Bülow addressed himself specially to the problem of an international reduction of armaments. His speech, though very moderate in form, was most disappointing in effect. He passed by Herr Hausmann's truthful suggestion that it would be far easier to obtain a naval accommodation with a Liberal British Government than with a Tory one, and in saying that no proposal had been made to Germany for such an understanding, he ignored the informal communications which Sir Edward Grey has undoubtedly set up. His line in argument was purely critical and negative. How could exact criteria of naval strength be set up? How could the growth of national interests and responsibilities be measured, and the value of new inventions calculated? However, Germany would not go beyond the necessities of her position, burdened as she was with a difficult problem of military defence on many frontiers, and with a social programme far in advance of that of any other nation. This, again, ignores the contention that Germany's naval strength is now out of proportion both to her needs and to her expenditure on military and social objects.

As we anticipated, the various motions for defining the responsibility of the Chancellor were referred by the Reichstag to a Committee after two days' inconclusive debate. The Home Secretary intervened, before the opening of the discussion, to explain that the Government appreciated the demand for a definition of the bare principle of responsibility formulated in the Constitution, and that while it would itself make no suggestions at this stage, the Federal Council would give the most careful attention to the decisions of the Reichstag.

This was a rather warmer welcome than had been expected, but no doubt the Government is confident that the Reichstag will come to no unanimous resolution of any importance. Certainly the debate indicated a wide difference of opinion among the parties. The Radicals pressed for real Constitutional Government—though not for the specific proposals of the Socialists; the Centre was against full Ministerial responsibility, but wanted merely a strengthening of the Chancellor's responsibility; the National Liberals disapproved the Reichstag sharing in the appointment and dismissal of Ministers, and were against robbing the Imperial Crown of its significance; while the Conservatives would not even go so far as to recommend the investigation of the question by the Reichstag. After the Constitutional debate, the Reichstag turned to the Budget, and a notable plea was advanced by the Centre for cutting down expenditure on the Navy. In Committee the Government's taxation scheme was badly mauled by the elimination of the arrangements with regard to the State contributions.

The suffragettes, after trying to enter into a treaty with Mr. Lloyd George, decided to interrupt his speech at the Albert Hall last Saturday, and to endeavour to bring it and the meeting of the Women's Liberal Federation to an end. They thus make war on all friends, men and women, who are not precisely in line with their tactics. In pursuance of this policy of destroying free speech, when speech is not satisfactory, one woman started addressing the meeting, and when the stewards approached her struck them with a dog-whip. Other cries of: "Deeds: not words," "Give us a message," "Be honest," and "You are a humbug," made part of a concerted demonstration carried on by suffragettes dispersed over different parts of the hall. This unwomanly conduct seems to have provoked some unmanly violence, although the stewards appear to have received special instructions to avoid it. In the end, after many women had been thrown out, more or less roughly, Mr. Lloyd George conquered the meeting, and addressed to it a plea for woman suffrage, reiterating the pledge to introduce a Reform Bill, open to an amendment in favor of the suffrage.

On this we have two remarks to make. The Government may or may not introduce such a bill during next Session. But, though the suffragettes will not believe it, we are afraid that the passage of such an amendment is now doubtful. The most distinguished friend of the suffrage in this country said, the other day, "the tactics of the suffragettes have thrown back the women's cause fifty years." We are afraid they have disposed of it for this Parliament. Our second criticism is that the suffragettes have some ground for thinking the suggested proceeding unreal. If the suffrage amendment were carried, how could the Prime Minister, who is opposed to woman suffrage, support it ex animo? And how could the Government go to the country on it so long as its own ranks were divided?

The Toronto "Globe," Sir Wilfrid Laurier's official organ, has published an article on Imperial Preference, which knocks the Imperialist stuffing out of the English Tariff "Reform" agitation. The Canadian Government is making up its mind to arrange a commercial treaty, on the basis of reciprocity, with the United States, Canada's nearest, most natural, and biggest market. American trade with Canada is already growing, despite the preference to Great Britain, faster than British trade, and reciprocity, which would, of course, reduce the preference to an infinitesimal, would still further assist American trade. More important still, it would strike the props away from beneath the fabric of Empire as the English Preferentialists see it, a fabric resting on an agreement to trade as much as possible within, and as little as possible without. The Toronto "Globe" leaves no doubt of its utter rejection of such a system designed to unite the Empire by a policy of "mutual hurts." "It would be unfortunate," it says, "if the impression were conveyed that British preference tied Canada's hands, and that she was thereby prevented from doing anything further to seek additional markets wherever she can find them." The true basis of Empire is freedom, the freedom of each State to adopt any fiscal policy it thinks best, and Canada will have just so much preference as pays her, and for the rest make any other arrangements she thinks profitable. That is the policy of the Laurier Government, a policy which is illustrated practically by the starting of negotiations for an understanding with Germany as well as with the United States.

The Home Secretary has so far modified the Prevention of Crime Bill as to secure its passage through the House of Commons. The indeterminate sentence disappears as a possible life penalty, but may be imposed within a minimum of five years and a maximum of ten. It is still to be used as an addition to a sentence of penal servitude, and therefore increases punishments. Prisoners are to be punished because they have been punished before, and to have more of a system which has no curative features and spoils the characters of prisoners by weakening them. No such power should have been placed in the hands of the present prison service. The Bill remains a great danger and a blot upon what, on the whole, has been an excellent administration of the Home Office. We hope that its handling by men like Sir William Grantham will be carefully watched.

We are sorry to see that the Colonial Office has supported the very trifling sentence passed on two officials connected with the British East Africa Protectorate. These men were found guilty of keeping, if not procuring, native girls of twelve or thirteen as their mistresses. One has lost a single year's seniority, coupled with the temporary loss of a district, and the other has simply been admonished. We should have thought that the high standard of British administration in this matter called for sterner measures.

Politics and Affairs.

THE REFORM OF THE CONSTITUTION.

> "You are dealing with a vast and overwhelming preponderance, a huge deadweight of prejudice, of passion, of interest, of bigotry, of blind class and party spirit—impenetrable by argument, immovable by discussion, beyond the reach of reason, and only to be driven from its hereditary and antiquated entrenchments—not by argument, or by reason, or by discussion, but by FORCE."—John Morley on the House of Lords.

SINCE we last wrote on the question of the House of Lords, opinion in the Liberal Party has greatly strengthened and hardened. It may, we think, be said that the Parliamentary majority realises now, what it should have realised before, that the Lords have brought its capital work to a dead stop, and that they will either kill Liberalism, or that Liberalism must kill them. It can exist on sufferance. Its Ministers can still administer. They can still pass Hop Bills. They are not debarred from framing Estimates and a Budget, and even, within limits, from carrying them, and from countering, here and there, a legislative defeat. In addition to these enjoyments of a modest livelihood, the Liberal Government and Parliament may freely choose the period of their own dissolution. The Lords cannot force them to go to the country if they fear to go. But wherever the purpose of Liberalism is vital, wherever it received a direct message from the people three years ago, its executive power has gone. Take two of its strongholds in the British nation—Scotland and Wales. Liberal Scotland has one powerful, mastering interest, the land question, and there has not been a sign since the General Election that she has abated her zeal for it. Both the Ministerial measures dealing with this problem have been destroyed by the Lords. There is not the smallest chance of reviving them during the life of this Parliament. Wales, practically a Nonconformist country, has, again, a dominant political object—the attainment of religious equality, to gain which she has for years sent a solid, or all but solid, Liberal representation to Parliament. But she has no more chance of getting Disestablishment than of restoring the rule of Llewelyn. Or take the historic subjects of Liberalism, such as education, the centre of the secular battle which French democracy has waged with its enemies since the Concordat. The Liberals proposed their solution when in full strength, fresh from a conflict in which every leading issue in the religious controversy had been fully canvassed. The Lords destroyed it, falsifying the pretence that they respect an electoral mandate and only reject Bills which a fair view of public opinion shows to be unpopular, and therefore inexpedient. Do we come to the land? The Liberals can tax, but they cannot reform. Do we think of poverty-stricken, discontented, troublesome, half-rebellious Ireland, the peculiar, almost the sole, glory and creation of the House of Lords? We know that our ability to help her substantially has departed. Do we speak of unemployment? Every issue which touches the present system of referring the whole body of out-of-work or disorganised laborers either to charity or to the poor-house must pass through a House intolerant of any modification of it. Of temperance we need not speak; a generation of defeat tells its own tale. Let the leaders of the great Liberal Party, if they will, spend the next thirty months in excogitating small ingenious devices for squeezing one second-rate Bill through the Lords, and holding out white flags to Lord Lansdowne in the interest of another interesting piece of social legislation. Let them pare and trim with forethought and industry, and then see what is left of their prestige at the end—with Nonconformity flouted, with labor dissatisfied, with their enthusiasts impatient and disheartened, with the town electorate, capricious and unstable at the best, but quick to see where a conquering cause resides, and where a beaten one.

No; we must look at things as they are, and recognise that the party system is practically at an end, and that the Liberal Party, victorious over its enemy until the middle of the 'eighties, has since then failed to win a single triumph over it, and is now so reduced in effective strength that the old Constitutional idea of a Monarchy upheld by two fairly equal political forces is obsolete. Nor, as things stand, is there any hope of rectifying the balance. There will never be another election like that of 1906, and yet under the conditions which governed the Administration that sprang from it, there never was a Government more clearly doomed to partial or to complete failure. It was almost a waste of time to put more than one issue to the tremendous force of opinion which drove Mr. Balfour out of office, but not out of power. The people should have been asked one thing, and one thing only—"Choose you this day whom you will serve. If, as John Bright told you forty years ago, you believe in being governed by 600 peers, serve them. But if you are for self-government, instruct your representatives clearly on one point of capital importance—the Reform of the British Constitution."

To this issue we have come, fourteen years after the prophetic warning of the most powerful and experienced of Liberal chieftains, and we predict that within a very few months everybody concerned in it, from the King to the humblest voter, will realise that all its rivals have disappeared, and that it holds the field. It is the special, the only, issue for Liberalism; but it is also a uniting issue for the whole body of progressive voters in the four nations, Nonconformists, Radicals, Nationalists, Labor men, the temperance party, the women suffragists, all of whom have either suffered some wound at the hands of the Lords, or have reason to fear it. When that question is settled, and not before, we can talk of democracy. We can even talk of a fair balance for political forces, a fair hearing for moderate views and interests, for when all criticism of progress masquerades as inveterate prejudice, whose one spur is self-interest and whose single restraint is fear, the countering force must sooner or later be revolutionary. That, of course, is the end to which the Balfour-Lansdowne policy drives. But why should we fear it? There is no advantage in disguising the extreme depression of the Liberal Parliamentary Party in face of the events of the last three weeks. That depression is natural and even useful, for it shows that the lesson of British politics for the last thirty years has been learned at last. When it has passed away, we shall see the spirit of the party rising to meet the emergency which has grown out of its history and genius and from the deep-seated needs of British democracy. The weapon of 1906 may have grown a little dull. But even if, like Siegmund's sword, it is broken, it will be forged anew. Either it, or a still stouter weapon, is strong enough to shatter the power of the Lords into fragments.

THE WEARING DOWN OF LIBERALISM.

Whatever may be said in criticism of the House of Lords, we ought not to deny them the possession of a vein of humor. Being in conflict with the democracy, and being aware that, whenever the conflict comes to an issue which finds both sides determined, the result is foregone, they deem it advisable to appoint a Select Committee to consider how they may be reformed. The Committee report in favor of the election of peers by peers, the maintenance of the element so elected in a standing majority, the opening of the House of Commons to peers who do not wish to serve in their own House, and the limitation of that right of the Crown to create peers which is the one Constitutional means at present available for deciding a conflict between the two Houses. It is true that the method of election would eliminate from their excessively casual attendance some of those who recently, to the bewilderment of doorkeepers, responded to the whip of Lansdowne House. It is true that the Report recognises the desirability of qualifying hereditary capacity with an admixture of trained official experience. But the net result of its recommendations would be to leave the hereditary element supreme, and the House as a whole more independent of popular forces than it is at present. As a contribution to the actual issue we may fairly regard this as a jest of no mean order as political humor goes.

Turning from jest to earnest, we may take the Report of the Committee as proving, if proof were needed, that there will be no such reform of the House of Lords from within as will accommodate it to the conditions of modern democracy. The problem is one which, under pain of sterilisation, democracy itself must take up. It is usual to compute the evil influence of the House of Lords by enumerating the Bills which they have wrecked or destroyed. But any such list gives a most inadequate measure of their mischievous activity. Their modern power dates from their partially successful assertion of their claims in relation to the Reform Act of 1884. At that period, following on the Irish Land Legislation of Mr. Gladstone, and coinciding with the beginnings of the Socialist movement in England, there began that tendency of "Property" to concentrate on one side of the party line which has been so marked a feature of all modern politics. But the Unionist Party was not a sufficient safeguard. It was always liable to an electoral reverse, and the unchallenged supremacy of the House of Commons meant the possibility of democratic legislation. A second line of defence was necessary, and it was found in the Peerage. Against this second line the Gladstone-Rosebery administration battered in vain. Already in the six years that followed the loss of the Home Rule Bill many new questions had arisen. The social upheaval which came to a head in the new Unionism and the Dock Strike, focussed quite a fresh set of forces, which impinged with somewhat distracting effect on the older Liberalism that had inspired Mr. Gladstone's great effort. The arrears of six years had accumulated. On all sides questions pressed for solution. The Liberal Party found itself committed to a long list of reforms, each of them challenging important interests. They exhausted their strength on Home Rule, and they spent themselves for naught. Unable to believe that their supporters would desert them, they conceived it their duty to go on calmly with their programme. They would "fill up the cup," and as soon as it brimmed over they would pour out the wrath of an insulted democracy on the head of an irresponsible knot of oligarchs. The event turned out differently. The cup was filled, but not, as Mr. Balfour has since remarked, the cup of the Lords. The effect of each new Bill was to alarm some fresh interest. The effect of each rejection was to weaken confidence in the power of the Liberal Government to make good its words. The final result was to combine all the vested interests in an organised attack upon a puzzled and dispirited party. Mr. Gladstone, as we now know, had seen the error, and had declined to go on with the Government on the policy proposed. He was for fighting, and when he was overruled on that and other grounds, he resigned.

The disaster ushered in ten years and more of Conservative reaction. For the greater part of the period social questions were held in abeyance by the absorbing interest of Imperialism. But though tongues may be still and ideals wax cold, facts remain, and the pressure of social problems did not grow less. The accumulation of arrears began anew, and once more a formidable list awaited the Government on their return to power. The immediate sequel is fresh in the mind. The situation created by the Lords is such that for upwards of twenty years barely a single legislative measure of the first rank has been passed by the Liberal Party. Two or three of a progressive character—Free Education, the establishment of County Councils, and the Compensation Act—have been passed by the Unionists, along with two or three measures of reaction of the first grade. What we find is that, outside finance, with extremely few exceptions, no great democratic measure can now go through until the whole country is converted to it, by the adhesion of both parties. This means that social legislation is permanently and seriously in arrear. It means also that it is for the most part carried through not by the enthusiasts who have pushed it on, but by the laggards who have tardily accepted it. But for politics it means more than this. The consequence of the block in the reform movement is the hopeless involvement of political issues. The philosopher, criticising the working of democracy from his superior height, complains of the want of rationality in political decisions. But how is it humanly possible for the average man to make a rational choice on the complication of issues presented to him to-day with Tariff Reformers bawling into one ear and Suffragettes screaming into the other, with Education, Temperance, Unemployment, Miners' Eight Hours Bills, Old Age Pensions, and a dozen other matters of controversy hurtling through the air? Before we condemn the ordinary voter as a man incapable of giving an intelligent vote on a straight issue, let us give him the straight issue to vote upon.

But it is not merely the average voter who suffers. The effect on the political enthusiast is even worse. His one anxiety is lest in the struggle for existence his pet project should be left out. If it is not included in the legislative programme he turns all his wrath on the Government, and will not be comforted though a dozen other items, to which he has given platform allegiance, are duly acknowledged in the King's Speech. What he demands is a Bill. Tell him that the Bill has no chance of becoming law, and he takes no notice. He wants his Bill; give it him, and he is satisfied. Let the Lords throw it out and he is vexed, but feels that it can be brought in again. As long as his particular log is well in the jam, stuck fast with all the others, he does not mind. But neither he nor the proprietors of any of the other logs will stop pushing for a moment in order to remove the barrier so that all may float in ordered succession down the stream. The most heated fights of the present day are not between reformer and Conservative, but between reformer and reformer. The jealous parents of legislative bantlings eye each other with a rivalry which contrasts wonderfully with the coolness of their attack on the common enemy. The struggle is for a place among the Bills. By comparison no one seems to care about his pet measure becoming law. All this confusion, all this distraction of the forces of progress, all this falsity in the attitude of the enthusiast, nine tenths of the trouble that has arisen between Liberals and Labour, between "constitutionalists" and militants, arise from this one cause—the existence of an irrational, antiquated, arbitrary, absurd, indefensible, but very strongly entrenched barrier upon democratic legislation. The work of removing this barrier is that on which every section of progressive opinion has now to combine.

WILL CANADA MAINTAIN HER PREFERENCE?

It is not unnatural that our Protectionists should manifest alarm at the cracking of the preferential plank in their platform. The Canadian preference, upon which they counted with so much confidence, never presented the substance or the stability which they imputed to it. Erected partly out of passing resentment against the hostile tariff of the United States, partly in a wave of Imperialistic enthusiasm, it was ill-adapted to meet the permanent and growing pressure of those economic interests which, especially in new countries, give an important meaning to the phrase "manifest destiny." No Canadian ever intended to sacrifice any present or future industrial or commercial development of Canada in order to strengthen the Imperial bond, or to secure to the Mother Country some profitable export trade. It was hardly set upon their Statute Book before a demand for its substantial reduction in respect of one of our most profitable trades, the woollen trade, issued from Canadian manufacturers, and was at once conceded. Last year a new tariff law was passed, which, by the introduction of an intermediate tariff, designed for negotiation, made another general encroachment upon the size of the preference.

But the immediate cause of alarm among Preferentialists on this side of the water is the policy of commercial treaties with particular foreign nations, the first of which, that with France, is now on the very eve of ratification. This treaty secures, not only for France, but for twenty other nations enjoying a most-favored nation treatment, terms better than are represented by the intermediate rate, and wherever there is competition with this country, as, for instance, in silk goods, there is a further nibbling at the preference. Though our two chief competitors for Canadian trade, Germany and America, do not yet come in for these concessions, signs of intentions to negotiate with Canada are not wanting on their side. They cannot afford to stand out for their proper share in this large, expanding market. Only this week we hear of an influential committee, of commercial and industrial men, formed in Germany to promote trade with Canada, and the possibility of a commercial treaty has been a matter of frequent discussion in both countries. But of far greater significance is the evidence of a gathering movement in the United States, not destitute of sympathy in Canada itself, for a commercial rapprochement between the two great North American nations. We do not set great store upon sensational declarations of highly interested railroad men, like Mr. J. Hill, in favor of absolutely free trade between the two countries. This consummation, in our judgment devoutly to be wished, is probably far distant. Nor can it be pretended that any strong, fully-conscious demand, either commercial or political, at present issues from the Canadian side. Partly through pride, partly for bluff, Canada holds a discreet silence. But keen-sighted public men believe that America will bid, and that if they hold back just long enough and not too long, they will get terms which they will neither dare nor care to reject. It is to the revision of the American protective system that we must look for the beginnings of a fresh attempt to extend the benefits of Free Trade through the North American continent.

To understand what may occur we must get below the surface of machine politics. The stalwarts of Republicanism, "stand-patters" in fiscal policy, still command a majority in both Houses, and the Committee of Ways and Means, which is already setting on foot investigations with a view to revision, is constituted chiefly of hard Protectionists who desire no considerable reform. But as politicians they are amenable to pressure, and pressure not merely of public opinion, representing the despised "consumer," but of more potent trade interests suffering from the poison of Protection, is gathering in various quarters. Until recently the only strong organised movement in favor of reciprocity with Canada proceeded from New England manufacturers, demanding free wool, hides, lumber, and other raw materials. But last February a strong gathering of business men from all parts of the country, held at Washington, pronounced in favor of a "non-partisan revision," with considerable reductions of duties. Immediately following the Presidential election came the bomb flung by Mr. Carnegie into his party. His article in the "Century" magazine urged that the age when America's infant industries needed protection had gone by, and that they could safely and profitably hold their own in open competition with the world. Of the steel industry the retired steel king declares, that "Not a ton of steel is produced in the world at as small an outlay for labor as in our country." Testimony in support of this view is pouring in from many other trades, and the abounding evidence of discrimination in prices against home purchasers, wherever a trust has established its control of prices, is making a profound impression on the mind of the ordinary American who has no Free Trade theory, but resents palpable injustice

The crowning disaster to the "stand-pat" cause, however, is the sensational revelation of the real way in which a "scientific tariff" is constructed, furnished by evidence brought last week before the Tariff Committee, a serviceable précis of which appears in last Monday's "Times." We do not hesitate to describe this as the most illuminating single piece of positive evidence of the moral meaning of Protection that has come to light during the whole period of recent tariff controversy. It consists of a number of letters which passed between a Mr. North, who, in 1897, acted as confidential clerk to the Senate Finance Committee, and the Woollen Association, in whose intersts he "worked" the Tariff, receiving a salary and "bonuses" for doing so." Mr. Whitman, President of the Woollen Association, writes thus to Mr. North: "I am unable to go to Washington, and have no one to look out for my interests but yourself, and I depend on you. Of course, Aldrich and Dingley will do all they can, but I depend upon your letting them know what I need. I depend upon you. Dress goods, yarns, and tops." To which Mr. North replies: "I will do the best I can with Allison when the time comes, but he knows nothing about the understanding I have with Aldrich on the worsted yarn schedule." The "Times" correspondent points out that this is no isolated instance, and cites another case, that of the Commission, which, under President Arthur, prepared the Tariff of 1883: "Out of nine members there were only three that were not deeply interested in the legislation they were passing." Those who in this country have insisted that Free Trade is the cause of public and private morality have sometimes been stigmatised as Pharisees. But such testimony as this must convince all who have any understanding of politics that Protection in any shape or form spells not merely commercial but moral disaster.

THE SECULAR SOLUTION.

The heads of the Church of England cannot, we think, be surprised that a strain of genuine relief should mingle with the general public regret for the loss of the Education Bill. Excellent as was the spirit and intention of the compromise, it had one inevitable defect. It was arranged, in the main, between two sets of religious leaders. The educationalists, the administrators and the managers, were hardly consulted, and another great body, the teachers, perhaps the most important of all, were unfriendly. Whatever the public might think of the "right of entry," the teacher, it is clear, regarded it with something like horror. He saw his class-work broken up, his discipline upset, his moral authority over his pupils invaded. He saw proselytism extended to a sphere from which it had been ruled out. We are bound to say that the scene and the language at the Church Council go some way to explain the ground of this hostility. How could teachers be anxious to introduce into the intimate life of the schools an element so exacting and so intolerant of broad ideas of Christianity, so averse from any kind of unity of thought and action with brother Christians, and at the same time so tenacious both of its dogmas and of its claim on the national purse? Who can be surprised that the average school teacher believes that he and his class can do more for the religious spirit among the children than the clerics and clerically minded laymen who would not even enter on the new and wide field of missionary work which the compromise assigned them until they had fastened their urban schools securely on the National Exchequer? For our part, we confess that our belief in the value of the right of entry, while it has been disappearing all through this controversy, was destroyed by our reading of the report of the meeting on Thursday week. Whatever the Church of England is, or is likely to become, she is undeniably ceasing, of her own act and will, to be national. The people who manage her do not seem even to desire that the Church shall come out into the main stream of the nation's life and take her chance with other religious organisations. Give her a stronghold of her own, give her wealth, privilege, security, and a highly specialised creed—then, and then only, does she seem to feel herself safe. Such a position has its clear consequence in the deliberate rejection of the treaty of peace with Nonconformity, and, we are bound to add, that for such a spirit there is little room in a body so complex, and requiring so much gentleness and tact in handling, as our school system.

We are afraid, however, that the failure of the negotiations carries with it a danger of fresh unsettlement when the religious question arises again in the schools. The Conservative Party are, we think, greatly mistaken if they imagine that with the revelation of the temper of the prevailing forces in the Anglican Church, the right of entry can now be proposed by a Conservative Government as part of an educational settlement. The moral of the failure is not that the Church does well when she mixes with affairs of State, but that she does ill, not that all the creeds should be introduced into the school-house, but that they should all be kept outside. So long as a form of Christian teaching, fluid, simple, and based on the poetry and spirit of the Christian religion rather than on its later intellectual refinements, could be set up with the concurrence of all the Churches, save the Roman Catholic, and taught by men who had most experience of the thought and life of childhood, what we call Cowper-Templeism stood on firm ground. Now that these conditions are disappearing, the problem takes quite another form. Cowper-Templeism never had any precise logical basis. Its best feature was that it lent itself to freedom of interpretation, and that the fact that it was a trifle more or less precise mattered less than the character and feeling of the men who interpreted it. But we are getting out of this human Christianity, running in paths which laboring men and children can follow. "The Churches," as Sir Oliver Lodge said on Tuesday, "condemn essentials and insist on peculiarities of doctrine." They take this line in days when the mass of working-men are detached from dogma, and live their lives, not, indeed, untouched by the Christian spirit, but unaffected by the subtleties that appeal to the benignant spirit of Lord Hugh Cecil and the broad intelligence of Dr. Wace. Moreover, if Cowper-Templeism is revised and this old ground ploughed up afresh, it will be found to be seamed all through by the critical work of the last thirty years —work that has been equally merciless to the very opposite conclusions of the two representatives of theology in the Church of England to whom we have referred. If, therefore, she hopes to reap any advantage from the intransigeant attitude of the dominant party, she will be grievously disappointed. She ought to be aware, if she possesses any acute vision of politics, that hardly a single party to the compromise, on one side or another, thought that the schools had much to gain from it. The main driving force in the settlement which we and other Liberal journals supported was the persuasion not that it would add any new or valuable element to the conduct of education, but that contact with the realities of the child life of the country might bring about a pause in a scandalous controversy. It is clear that the leaders of the Church lack the moral and intellectual power to bring about any such result, and that the ground on which they work is too stubborn and unfruitful to yield even to the Primate's skilful culture. But if the right of entry is dead, and, we venture to predict, will never be revived with the assent of the Liberal Party, we do not think that Cowper-Templeism itself, though it may have a longer life, can stand the shock to which it will be exposed on all sides the moment it is pushed into the field of active controversy. There is nothing in the secular solution to appal the Nonconformists, and there should be nothing to confound or alarm the man who realises that the best custodians of religious ideals are not necessarily the keepers of the institutions that enshrine them.

THE INEFFECTIVENESS OF MR. ROOSEVELT.

Mr. Roosevelt's last message lies at length on editorial desks, a portly pamphlet of thirty thousand words. It is half as long as the average novel of commerce, and very nearly as dull. For seven years we have been reading this message, and at length its platitudinous violence has begun to weary. There were, we suppose, in the United States some persons, possibly even some millions of persons, who began by mistaking the strenuous word for the strenuous life. All this brandishing of literary thunderbolts must surely mean somewhere a real assault upon some one of the evils which challenged attack. We confess we shared this belief. Here was a slayer of bears, a trainer of wild horses, a master of even wilder words, who seemed to be always rallying some battalion of simple, virtuous citizens against an immoral abuse, precisely as he had rallied his cowboys against the Empire of Spain. One drew one's breath, expecting to see the mob march out to deal destruction to the trusts, much as the mobs march out in a Texan town to lynch a negro. An "effete" Constitution—the word is peculiarly American—stood in the way, but at the psychological moment the Constitution would bow to popular indignation, much as the sheriff surrenders the keys of his gaol to the white avengers. These messages were the typical utterance of a muscular civilisation, a civilisation which has failed to establish honest courts, but takes refuge in the "unwritten law." The seven years are near their end, and they have produced just seven times thirty thousand words. The cowboys are working for the wages of wealthier men, and most of the moralists who applauded these resonant appeals to all the virtues, are, one suspects, clerks in the offices of some trust. Nothing of any note has happened save a tremendous financial crash, in which Mr. Roosevelt and the Treasury were fain to accept the magnanimous aid of the two arch-contrivers of trusts, Mr. Pierpont Morgan and Mr. Rockefeller. For the rest the trusts are as supreme as ever. No one affects to believe, least of all Mr. Roosevelt himself, that they have been brought under control. The only form of association which has been checked and frustrated is that of trade unionism. The general picture is faithfully sketched in this Presidential message, which reminds us of those Southern States which have no law at all for the limitation of child labor, and touches on the absence of protection for women, of compensation for accidents, and of any scheme of old age pensions for workers.

Against this system of corruption and oppression

Mr. Roosevelt flings himself with boyish fervor, without the necessary scientific equipment. He can see that a certain extravagance of "predatory" finance is morally "bad," and he conceives of a serviceable, industrial activity which is positively "good." But he does not grasp the fundamental fact that every combination, carried on as it is on the American scale with an eye to Wall Street, to Congress, and the tariff, is necessarily predatory. It is true enough that every combination involves the benefit that comes from the economy of large production and the cessation of wasteful competition. But these incidental benefits are not the motive of the chief engineers of trusts, nor is it on them that their profit depends. The formation of the typical trust involves, after the first stage of "cutting" warfare, the buying up of single businesses at a ransom price, and the operation is usually performed at least twice over, once by a promoter or middleman, and finally by the trust. It is the profits to be picked up in this operation which are the chief incentive, and the luckless shareholder who has invested in the watered stock of a trust company who is the first victim. The ultimate victim is, however, the consumer, who pays the price which monopoly, secure behind the tariff, enables the trust to impose. The extent to which this "predatory" wealth is even remotely the reward of any service or public benefit is quite infinitesimal. Around the system flourish its infinity of parasites—the collusive banks, the venal newspapers, the judges who are recommended by the Standard manager for their "familiarity" with oil business, the trust lawyers who are also party "bosses," and the Congressmen who push through the necessary legislation. Against it all Mr. Roosevelt, with his old-world watchwords, has broken his brave words in vain.

Where Mr. Roosevelt has failed Mr. Taft will not succeed. The Hearst revelations succeeded in discrediting each of the two orthodox parties in nearly equal degrees. The final verdict on the anti-trust campaign was uttered when Mr. Rockefeller announced that his vote would be cast for Mr. Roosevelt's nominee. The Republican majority is not difficult to explain. Faced with two parties, equally suspect, equally futile, the plain man was tempted to vote for the party which had the machine in its hands, and the rewards of subservience at its command. Of any way out one sees as yet scarcely an opening. The revolt can only come from Labor, but Labor at present too often finds its account in making terms with the enemy. The "grafters" at San Francisco, in league with the Republican machine and a powerful railroad, were themselves trade union officials. Mr. Roosevelt, so far from dreaming of any appeal to these reserve forces, aims rather at encouraging the workman to become an investor. He has achieved nothing, and constructed nothing. But with all his empiricism and his almost pathetic ignoring of the issue, his terms of office have certainly made an epoch, and given consciousness to the unrest. He failed to diagnose the evil, but he felt it. His thirty thousand words must leave behind them, at least, a sense of groping disaffection, a spirit of resistance and indignation, which will search till it finds first its teacher, and at last its leader.

Life and Letters.

THE STAR OF MILTON.

The last thing with which one would compare a politician's soul is a star. The last thing one would say of a pamphleteer's soul is that it dwells apart. Soiled with the dust and sweat of controversy, distracted by passing interests, encompassed by crowding humanity, torn with the daily rage, occupied with tactics, maligned by evil tongues, clutching at compromises as triumphs, or engrossed in the infinitely little as practical concerns, how is a soul to be called a star? How can it dwell apart? It would seem as reasonable to call a scavenger the King of Kings, and to say he dwelt in a stately pleasure dome.

Milton's age was, above all others in our history, an age of politics and controversy. Every question that can be raised upon human society, from communism to clothing, from the form of government to the cut of hair, was disputed with a remorseless and blinding conviction that often left the disputant dead upon the field. There was no action of ordinary life, no convention of daily intercourse, and no theory of State upon which someone or other might not lose his reasonableness and "go Fantee" with the first weapon that came handy, whether it were the libel or the pike. To civil dudgeon in every form were added the theological hatreds which alone could surpass the virulence of party. Ideas of God and of His worship, that to most people remain so secret, remote, and evanescent in the heart, appeared as harshly definite, as fit a subject for apostolic blows and knocks as the religious teaching in our primary schools. The visionary distinctions of doctrine were deemed natural themes for decision by infallible artillery. It was hardly reasonable that a doubter on the form of Church government should be allowed to live. To question dogma implied an unspeakable depravity, and for theological abuse in the pamphlets of the day it has been truly said, "the gamut of charges always ranged from bad grammar to unnatural crime."

Into the thick of these controversies, where the dust was most stifling and the shouting wildest, Milton plunged from the height of his intellect. Regardless of fame already won, disdaining the art already carried to a perfection unsurpassed in English verse, for the twenty most productive years of a poet's life he ceased to be a poet at all. In crossing the centre of life's bridge, the man to whom poetry was the final cause of existence, produced an average of less than fourteen lines a year. Except that he appears never to have actually borne arms upon the field, he stood aloof from hardly any phase of the conflicts then raging. Wherever there was a blow to be struck for freedom of thought or speech or government, there he was found with the drawn sword of the spirit in his hand, ready for onslaught or defence—ready for anything except the meditative peace and leisure that a poet's life is thought to require. It did not matter what buffets he received, or with what filthy scorn he was bespattered. The abuse showered on him by the greatest Latinist of Europe would rank with the anonymous postcards of to-day:—

> "A puppy," cried his enemy, arguing in support of royal supremacy: "once my pretty little man, now blear-eyed, or rather a blindling; having never had any mental vision, he has now lost his bodily sight; a silly coxcomb, fancying himself a beauty; an unclean beast, with nothing more human about him than his guttering eyelids; the fittest doom for him would be to hang him on the highest gallows, and set his head on the Tower of London."

It did not matter that Milton's own share in the conflict was, apparently, quite ineffectual, and that, but for his name, none of his pamphlets would now be remembered by any but antiquarians, or, at the most, only one. In the fight for freedom neither suffering nor success are counted. The fighting itself is all, and when the battle is hot, there is no time to criticise the blows, so long as they are quick and hard. Where freedom was at stake, not even the object of his existence could hold Milton back from the unpoetic turmoil. He failed at every point His blows made next to no impression.

His cause was finally overwhelmed in a ruin that left him too much despised for hanging. His failure is now seen to cast no shadow on the glory of his conflict; but how must it have looked to him amid the wretchedness of retreat when the yelling of triumphant evil came hot upon the death scene of the cause for which he had given all? How could Wordsworth say of such a man, "Thy soul was like a Star, and dwelt apart"?

As when the wrack of storm drifting round our little planet conceals the depths of the firmament, so the star of Milton's soul was hidden in the depths of personality from year to year. Remote and forgotten, it stood obscured, almost as if it had never shone. We can hardly say how far the poet himself was still conscious of its effulgence. The man who before his silence had reached in "Lycidas" the supreme mastery of English verse—did he realise the purest ray still flashing within him, and did he regret its long eclipse behind the earth's shadow? The miracle is that when the tempest passed away, taking with it all the good of life but life itself, the star shone out upon the ruins of a world with brilliancy undiminished since the first days when it had sung together with its morning peers. The heart of the soul, like a starry jewel, had survived unchanged in darkness. Take any lines from "Lycidas" and the "Paradise Lost," and you may call both equally Miltonic, though twenty years of prose and tumult have passed between. Take any of the so familiar lines that have given to English the splendor of a classic tongue:—

"Yet once more, O ye laurels, and once more,
Ye myrtles brown, with ivy never sere,
I come to pluck your berries harsh and crude,
And with forced fingers rude
Shatter your leaves before the mellowing year."

And then see with what unchanged and undiminished radiance the star of Milton shone when it again emerged:—

"Who shall tempt with wandering feet
The dark unbottomed infinite abyss,
And through the palpable obscure find out
His uncouth way, or spread his aery flight
Upborne with indefatigable wings
Over the vast abrupt, till he arrive
The happy isle?"

Or compare "Il Penseroso" and "L'Allegro" with the fourth book of "Paradise Lost," which is a kind of exalted repetition of their themes:—

"Now came still Evening on, and Twilight gray
Had in her sober livery all things clad;
Silence accompanied; for beast and bird,
They to their grassy couch, these to their nests
Were slunk, all but the wakeful nightingale;
She all night long her amorous descant sung;
Silence was pleased."

And remember the same vivid perception suffused by the true scholar's memory, not of words, but of impressions in the early lines:—

"To behold the wandering moon,
Riding near her highest noon,
Like one that had been led astray
Through the heaven's wide pathless way,
And oft, as if her head she bowed,
Stooping through a fleecy cloud."

In power of phrase, winning immortality by a sudden glory, there survived the same Miltonic touch, unexercised for all those years. "The light fantastic toe," "Laughter holding both his sides," and "neat-handed Phillis," have passed into the common speech of England. And so no less have the "human face divine," the "sweet, reluctant, amorous delay," "imparadised in one another's arms," "thyself not free, but to thyself enthralled," "to be weak is to be miserable," "whom not to know argues himself unknown," and fifty more, while the "darkness visible" has passed from us to all the world.

Somewhere through those years of noble warfare and rude contact with common fate, the soul of the greatest master of our language—a master standing on the same level with Virgil and Dante—had in hiding retained its splendor, though it dwelt apart, hardly remembered even by the man in whose mind it lurked. It is possible that, in spite of his eager occupation with the passing world, Milton lost something by the aloofness and isolation of his soul. There is a well-known criticism of Goethe upon Heine's enemy, Count von Platen, that he had every other gift, but wanted love. Sometimes, in turning from Milton to a far inferior man, one feels that there is even in him something of that want. With all the admiration that can never be given him in excess, there are few who could say that they loved him. Our people have given Byron, or even Burns, more love in a year than Milton has won in three centuries, for love is worth love. With all his supremacy over word and thought, all that miracle of associated meaning and mighty-mouthed invention of harmonies, it is seldom that he can drive the arrow of emotion straight into the heart of mankind, like Wordsworth with his simple-seeming rhyme:—

"She lived unknown, and few could know
When Lucy ceased to be;
But she is in her grave, and O!
The difference to me."

Nor was his star near enough the earth for laughter. For laughter and love we must go to other great names in our literature, and there are many.

But from Milton, whose soul thus dwelt apart, persistent in its isolation as in its brilliancy, we have received other things that none of our many writers have given. Mark Pattison, who was the finest of the poet's critics, has said, "An appreciation of Milton is the last reward of consummated scholarship"; and to scholars there is in Milton the joy of communion with a soul that has been nourished only on the best of human thought. "Labor and intense study I take to be my portion in this life," wrote the poet, and the result of that labor was a mind so filled with beauty that it instinctively eschewed the vulgarity which is our country's besetting sin. But the common man who is no scholar may still find in the poet's life our noblest example of unyielding courage:—

"What though the field be lost?
All is not lost; the unconquerable will,
And study of revenge, immortal hate,
And courage never to submit or yield,
And what is else not to be overcome."

The courage that does not flinch when the field is lost, the instance of a soul which can subsist with undimmed brightness beneath the cares of the world and the dust of conflict and the savage triumph of the commonplace—these are endowments that Milton has bequeathed to our nation more precious even than a language of ancient dignity, and poems that seem likely to survive our race.

THE BIBLE AS CRITICISM OF LIFE.

To prove it out of the Bible was a method of unanswerable demonstration much in use in earlier times, when, if verbal inspiration had abandoned its secure affirmations, there still remained a wide belief that such proof was of greater value than any appeal to uninspired reason. So that Britain was the inheritance of the lost ten tribes, that Napoleon was the Great Beast of the Apocalypse, that the end of the world was foretold at a certain date in time (generally near), were statements accepted as unquestioningly in thought as the details of the Levitical law were accepted in action. Only occasionally, as in the conflict with property or deep-seated prejudices, in demand that the land should belong to the people or that usury should be prohibited, did there arise a repudiation of plain and definite commandment. The work of an enlightening, if somewhat drastic, criticism has swept away the sanction of these sharp-cut declarations. To eyes thus trained the Hebrew literature has tended to vanish in a mist of myth and poetry, in which there emerge legendary figures, or metaphorical visions of beast and cloud and star. Mr. Strachey has done well, in a most attractive little volume of extract and essay, to remind his readers of another side of the matter. In "The Practical Wisdom of the Bible" (Pitman & Sons), he turns aside from all the wealth of religious aspiration and magnificence of symbolism and denunciation, which give to this literature a unique place in history, to glean up examples of the wisdom of daily life—the small experiences of every day—which lie embedded there. Some of his illustrations show perhaps a tendency toward didactic teaching read into the old words from a later experience. Thus the advantages of the delegation of authority are exhibited by Jethro's advice to Moses. A passage in Ecclesiasticus is used to demonstrate the uselessness of the "men of business," or the artisan with "the noise of the hammer and the anvil ever in his ears," as political statesmen, incidentally to serve as a kind of prophecy of Mr. Strachey's ideal modern statesman, Mr. John Burns. In an attempt to suck practical wisdom from the testimony here recorded of a nation passing from birth to decay, through all human experience, there must of necessity be continual conflict. The Republican confronts the Imperialist, sacerdotalism is challenged by a violent anti-clerical uprising, the ardor of youth confronts the cold wisdom of age, in part fearful, in part defiant. In the earlier time the members of a people living a simple, austere, and dangerous life, are filled with a kind of exultation in the procession of the seasons and the wonders of the world, praising in ecstasy not only the sun and moon and the benignant rains, but also fire and hail, snow and vapor, stormy wind "fulfilling His word." In a later age, when prosperity has fissured the nation into rich and poor, and material comfort, multiplied, has brought no increase of pleasure but rather disquietude, the soul of man sees little but the evil which is under the sun, and protests good and evil alike to be but vanity. There are many counsels of prudence, of a worldly wisdom which avoids the extreme for the mean, of a worldly wisdom which, in its deliberate acceptance of the ignoble mean, still shines ironic across all the judgments of the centuries. "Fear thou the Lord and the King," says one. "Meddle not with them that are given to change." "Give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish," says another, "and wine unto them that be of heavy heart. Let him drink and forget his poverty and remember his misery no more." Keep the sovereign people drunk, in other words, and there need be no fear of Socialism: the rich can sleep o' nights in peace. "Great men are not always wise"; the firmer days are not always better. "Knowledge of wickedness is not wisdom." Yet against these dicta of the "man of the world" there sweeps a fierce invective from those who, like Nietzsche, advocate that life should be "lived dangerously." And "Be not righteous overmuch" is challenged by the bitter and contemptuous declaration: "Because thou art neither hot nor cold, I will spue thee out of my mouth."

The Revolutionists, in a catena of authority, have undoubtedly the best of it. That is why every revolutionary movement, from the peasants' revolt of 1381 to the peasants' revolt of 1885, have always gone to the Hebrew Bible for inspiration. John Ball and his allies appealed to the time when Adam delved and Eve span. Mr. Tuckwell, as he has told us in his reminiscences, went through agricultural England with the book of the prophet Isaiah in his hand. There are clerical and monarchial documents in this variegated literature. But certainly the general flavor and tone are helpful to those stern men who hoped to see the last king strangled in the entrails of the last priest. With what an elemental appeal, as if of a definite stage in the degeneration which Rousseau thought to be the keynote of all human history, comes the record of the day when the Hebrews determined to set up a king. The warning appears less as the speech of one wise man than as the general wisdom of the dolorous experience of a thousand years. "And, he said, 'This will be the manner of the king that shall reign over you: He will take your sons and appoint them for himself, for his chariots, and to be his horsemen; and some shall run before his chariots. And he will appoint him captains over thousands and captains over fifties: and will set them to ear his ground and to reap his harvest, and to make his instruments of war and instruments of his chariots. And he will take your fields, and your vineyards, and your olive yards, even the best of them, and give them to his servants. . . . And ye shall cry out in that day because of your king, which ye shall have chosen you: and the Lord will not hear you in that day." "Nevertheless," continues the chronicler sadly—he is chronicling, like all historians, the record of human folly—"nevertheless, the people refused to obey the voice of Samuel: and they said, 'Nay, but we will have a king over us, that we also may be like all the nations.'"

But it is not only the madness of peoples which is here set down for wonder or for tears. The individual life, no less the sport and play of contending forces, here also journeys along its perilous path in which a slip to right hand or left may result in utter destruction. The unchangeableness of human experiences—or rather the magnitude of that which is common, in comparison with that which is variable—is one of the dominant impressions of such testimony of universal application. This is the East, that is the West. Abysses of time yawn between the making and unmaking of Empires, the coming and passing of great hopes and dreams, comfort and security, destruction, comfort and security again. Yet in the little white streets of these tiny walled towns, set in a limited land between the desert and the sea, there is being played the whole drama of life as rounded and complete as in the gardens of the modern cities of pleasure, or amid the clanging and tumult of the modern cities of pain. That drama is in part concentrated in certain frequent phrases which carry an air of finality: "Oppression maketh a wise man mad." "Where there is no vision the people perish." "Hope deferred maketh the heart sick." "Many waters cannot quench love." It is in part revealed in the effort made by age to apprise youth of the dangers of the way, preaching an asceticism which is in part the product of wisdom, and in part the product of weariness. In these hot, quiet Eastern cities here also the young are turning to wine, not knowing that "at the last it biteth like an adder": are going with strange women "as an ox goeth to the slaughter," heedless of the knowledge that "she has cast down many wounded: yea, many strong men have been slain by her." Here also the observer can descry—as Mr. Carnegie or Mr. Upton Sinclair to-day—"a sore evil which I have seen under the sun—namely, riches kept for the owners thereof to their hurt." And even here is also the passionate protest against those who "counted our life a pastime and our time here a market for gain": who declare that as "our life is short and tedious and in the death of a man there is no remedy," therefore "let us enjoy the good things that are present," let us oppress the poor righteous man, let us not spare the widow: let us (in a word), like the Superman of modern idolatry, declare "our strength" to be "the law of justice: for that which is feeble is found to be nothing worth."

There is worldly wisdom in it, and a wisdom which is beyond the world, in which, through "the multitude of the wise," is found the "welfare of the world." There is warning here also, and indignation, and sometimes the note of a great sadness, in the sense of the inadequacy of human resistance to death and the fretting forces of time. But more conspicuous than any of these is a certain note of irony, the irony which comes from a simplicity surveying a world whose secrets then and now baffle the observer, and whose actions refuse to respond to any consistent law of justice or of kindness. There is irony in the bare record of the kings as they come and go, phantom shapes but dimly visible before a background of darkness, with all their varied impulses of ambition, effort, and rich experience concentrated in a phrase: "He did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord: and he slept with his fathers: and his son reigned in his stead." There is irony in the continual challenge of the proverbial injunction, "Be good and you will be happy and prosperous," by the vision of the ungodly set in prosperity, coming to no misfortune like other folk, nor plagued like other men. And there is a larger irony in the vision of the observer who is wearied with futilities both of human effort and the larger world outside: who sees—within—"all the oppressions that are done under the sun," only a little less unendurable than its mirths and pleasures: who sees—without—the wind going towards the south and turning about unto the north again: all the rivers running into the sea, and yet the sea not full. It is from a stored-up memory of this perpetual fracture and breakage of all moral deductions drawn from a "natural religion" that the writers of the later time came more and more to transfer their affections to a region where wrong will be righted, and moral judgment receive its vindication in expression of that deep conviction that the "last word" remains yet to be spoken concerning the meaning and purpose of human life.

THE NOVELETTE AND THE SUPERWOMAN.

Stevenson, in an essay which has never been republished, tells how, in a "lone house on a moor," he fell on a packet of penny novelettes, and pursued original research into the pages of the "Young Ladies' Journal," where he obtained an extensive knowledge of the tender affairs of Doris and Sybil. The stories, it seems, were "not ill done, but were well abreast of the average tale in the circulating library," and yet the creator of Alan Breck and John Silver, and the blind man who came tapping with his stick, complains that the eminent gentleman who contributed to that miscellany had only one tale to tell, forgetting that a French critic has asserted that there is only one subject in literature. In the stories into which Stevenson pursued research, it was the tale of a poor girl, who, after a few tender passages, finally marries a peer of the realm, and disappears in the society of a diamond tiara, or, "at the worst," she declines on a baronet, and a baronet, if you read such things, is "none accounted of."

But Stevenson is out of date. These were only the dreams of the workman's daughter, and the novelette has now become middle-class. This is no longer the story which appeals to the girl who has shaken herself free from Mid-Victorian traditions and gone out to earn her own livelihood. The journey in the tram and the morning 'bus that bear the typist to the City often occupies two hours of the girl's time, and so she reads as she goes in and reads as she comes back. What these voyagers read must be portable, and must be in accordance with the new ideals of girlhood. The writers are women, and the fictitious names often veil the identity of authors whose books are on the shelves, and are even asked for at the counter. Some of them are prodigiously industrious, and one over-worked lady, who has toiled for twenty or thirty years in this insatiable market, informed the writer that she wrote two novelettes every week, and admitted that, by turning out a hundred new stories every year, she had to pay income tax on £1,500 or £1,600 In all these stories love is the main theme. Like the books of the late Mr. Fielding, they are not produced to prove anything in religion or politics; they are "writ to cure the spleen." And yet they contain latent ideas of social revolt, and throw the strangest light on the changing dreams of middle-class girls.

The wine of social revolt is chiefly in the form of the plot, where a drachm of rebellion is suspended in an ocean of adventure. The figures that move these pleasing tales are no longer the baronet and the humble girl. Gone is the duke; gone the viscount; gone the baronet who was in the Guards, or, if he linger, he is old and quite over forty, and, therefore, almost patriarchal. In the matter of age, at least, the young girl still clings to the ideas of Marianne in "Sense and Sensibility." The story of King Cophetua and the beggar maid, who was raised by her beauty to a throne, has drawn readers by its charm all along the course of literature. But in the stories which the typist reads as she goes to business, or as she lunches on a glass of milk and a slice of cake, it is the maiden who stoops for love, and man is a poor thing whom she puts in his proper place.

The story begins with a young girl. She is too young, perhaps, to bear the shocks of this rough world, though she is the same age as Racine's Julie, and Molière's Agnes, and Voltaire's Zaire; though she is no younger than Shakespeare's Juliet. But she differs from them in the fact that she has set out to earn her own livelihood, and, like Dogberry, is "one that hath had losses." She may be a typist, she may be a companion, she may be a public singer with a voice which you are informed is "wonderful," or meddle with paints and brushes, in which case you will certainly find her work—about chapter eight—in the Academy, to the envy of mere male artists. In fine, she is now always a member of the middle or professional classes suddenly flung from comparative ease into the arena where she fights for a tumbler of milk and a penny slice of cake in a tea-room. Her father, it seems, was a barrister, the profession of law being greatly overcrowded in fiction. Or, he was an artist, with a real velvet coat and a practicable, but empty, purse. Sometimes he falls so low as to be a journalist, but that is almost disgraceful.

Along with this lady there is a gentleman who comes from the "Colonies," usually Australia. There is a distinct impression, which the government of that country should seek to counteract, conveyed to the mind of the reader, that there is something disgraceful in those remote parts. He is often declared to be an engineer, but he has never been known to do any work in the course of eight or nine chapters, and his function is to be shut up in "a private lunatic asylum." This gentleman is, of course, the heir to the property which the young lady, at the beginning of the story, has lost through an unfortunate carelessness about a "paper" on the part of the family lawyer. Somewhere, however, about chapter eight, it is discovered—by means of a "paper" in the left-hand drawer of an old bureau—that Mademoiselle, the young lady, who is now companion to an elderly lady with dogs, is the real owner of the property, and that the young gentleman, the alleged engineer, is penniless.

And then comes a situation which would probably have shocked the late Mr. Pym. "Kathé" (or Claribel, or even Miranda, as the case may be), he says, hoarsely, turning away his eyes from the sight of her tremulous little face, "I am a poor man!"

"No; not poor," she says, with a queer, twisted smile, and her face neatly flushing; "not poor, for you have—you have me!"

Thereupon he gives a start of astonishment, and is handsomely surprised, though, as she has been making the same generous offer every week for twelve years, the gentleman need not have been so disturbed. He even says, "Mirabel (or Kathé, or even Kate), do you mean it?"

And then it transpires that she does. "And with a glad cry, Geraldine goes into his arms, and she has found her happiness at last." "Another Splendid Story Next Week!" But the advertisement is not to be believed. It is the same young man and the same young lady in a new dress or a new moustache, with their names magically changed.

We have only to put this typical case side by side with the scene in "Pride and Prejudice," where Mr. Collins offers for the hand of Elizabeth, to feel the difference. "I am well aware," he says, in the most handsome manner, "that one thousand pounds in the four per cents.—which will not be yours till after your mother's decease—is all that you will ever be entitled to. On that head, therefore, I shall be uniformly silent, and you may assure yourself that no ungenerous reproach will ever pass my lips when we are married." This is nobly said, but it belongs to an extinct state of society. "So these two," writes a lady in one of the stories which we pass under review; "so these two, whom love was drawing together, were kept apart by circumstances, and Josephine felt that Ralph Connor, the man who owed all he had to her, would never tell his love!" To emphasise the situation, the editor has generously provided an illustration of a sorrowing young lady and a despairing young man sitting in their lonely rooms, far apart, and at opposite sides of the page. These are now the dreams of girlhood. So the china merchant in the fairy tale thought that when he was rich he would spurn the Vizier's daughter. But under her ribbons the heart of the typist beats true to the instincts of her sex, for she only wishes to give "all" to "Ralph Connor."

PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION.

When I was permitted to invite the readers of The Nation to fill up and send in the voting papers of the illustrative election organised by the Proportional Representation Society, I dwelt chiefly on the duties of the voter. That was the business of the hour. I explained the simple work the voter had to do, and expressed the conviction it would be found easy by all. The result more than justified this declaration. Out of 21,690 papers sent in, only 18 were declared by the returning officer invalid, and he was a very Rhadamanthus. In one paper an eccentric but not unintelligent voter had added the name of Mr. Grayson as a candidate, giving him his first vote and Mr. Balfour his second. In another a wilful varier from prescribed usage marked his preferences with the letters A, B, C, D, &c., instead of with the figures 1, 2, 3, 4, &c. In a third a voter marked one name with a × and followed it up with 2, 3, 4, &c., for other candidates. All these votes were disallowed, so that no more than 15 papers at most were bad through mere defect of understanding on the part of the voter. It may be urged that the electorate was self-selected, and above the lowest standard of an ordinary constituency; but against this it must be remembered that in such constituencies the individual voters would receive abundance of personal instruction, and the conclusion is irresistible that the exercise of the single transferable vote presents no real difficulty to British citizens. The illustrative election of last week further proved that the task of the returning officer was, as the Lords Committee unanimously found last year, one which returning officers of the usual standard could be trusted to discharge. A returning officer would, indeed, be wise to have a couple of skilled assistants to check the transfers of votes, but there would be no difficulty in securing such help. What had the returning officer to do? His sorters distributed the good voting-papers in heaps corresponding to the names against which the figure 1 had been marked in the several papers, with the following result.

Asquith	9,042	Lord H. Cecil ...	460
Balfour	4,478	Shackleton ...	398
Lloyd George ...	2,751	Burt	260
Macdonald ...	2,124	Leif Jones ...	191
Henderson ...	1,038	F. E. Smith ...	164
Long	672	Joynson-Hicks ...	94

These figures make a total of 21,672; and the first duty of the returning officer is to ascertain the quota or number necessary to secure the election of a candidate. The imaginary constituency returned five members, and the rule directed the officer to divide the votes—21,672—by six—one more than the number to be elected—and the result being 3,612, the next whole number—3,613—is the quota. The reason is simple—3,613 exceed 1-6th of 21,672, and the number left—18,059—are therefore less than 5-6ths. It is impossible to divide this number left into five lots, each equal to 3,613, and it is still more impossible to divide it into lots each greater than this; and it follows that if any candidate secures as many as 3,613 votes he must be one of the five at the top of the poll. More shortly, any man who gets more than one-sixth of the votes cast cannot be beaten by five others dividing among themselves the remainder, or less than 5-6ths. I have known people to find a difficulty in understanding the reason of this rule, but nobody who can do a sum in simple division finds a difficulty in applying it.

Turning back to the votes secured by the several candidates, it is seen that Mr. Asquith and Mr. Balfour had each got more than the quota, and these were promptly declared elected, Mr. Asquith ranking first, as having the greatest surplus. He had, indeed, no less than 5,429 surplus votes, and here arose the only nice piece of work that had to be done—the proportional distribution of this surplus. My own belief is that any 5,429 papers taken at random out of the 9,042 papers would produce the same result, but there are scrupulous souls who have no trust in the practical certainty of chance in large numbers: and to meet their misgivings an exact rule of distribution has been adopted. All the 9,042 of Mr. Asquith are re-examined, so as to ascertain how the second preferences on them are marked in respect of other candidates, the 9,042 being, in fact, distributed in new heaps corresponding to the preferences shown for the other candidates. It was found that on 33 no second preference had been marked, and the second preferences on the remaining 9,009 numbered as follows:

Lord H. Cecil ...	132	Long	46
Henderson ...	261	Macdonald ...	2,387
Jones	176	Shackleton ...	35
Joynson-Hicks ...	17	F. E. Smith ...	16

It must be noted that as Mr. Balfour had already got his quota, such of Mr. Asquith's papers as had Balfour marked 2 upon them were counted for the next man, who became, in fact, the next preference. What followed was calculation: 5,429 had to be taken away from 9,009, and a number was taken from each heap of the second preferences above shown in the proportion of 5,429 to 9,009. I need not go through the transfers passed on to each candidate. It will be seen at once that Mr. Lloyd George would get the bulk of the transferred votes, and he did, in fact, receive 4,704, bringing him up to 7,807, much above the necessary quota. Mr. Balfour's surplus was distributed in precisely the same manner as Mr. Asquith's, but this brought no additional candidate above the quota.

The next work was to pass on the unnecessary surplus votes Mr. Lloyd George had received. His original bundle of 2,751 was left intact. The voters who marked these papers abided by the first choice they had shown, and the only problem was to pass over the surplus of the votes that had been brought to Mr. Lloyd George, and for this purpose to examine the next preferences on all the votes transferred to him, and to transfer the surplus in the proportions indicated by this examination. At the end of this stage Mr. Asquith, Mr. Balfour, and Mr. Lloyd George were, of course, elected, while the poll of the remaining candidates stood as follows:—

Burt	1,793	Long	1,282
Lord Hugh Cecil	822	Macdonald ...	2,378
Henderson ...	2,032	Shackleton ...	683
Leif Jones ...	1,396	F. E. Smith ...	258
Joynson Hicks ...	167

What followed was quite easy and simple work: the voting-papers of those found lowest were taken and transferred in accordance with the subsequent preferences shown upon them, the number of surviving candidates being reduced at each step and the number of their supporters increasing. Mr. Smith and Mr. Hicks were taken together first, as their total strength was less than that of the candidate next above them, and as Mr. Shackleton remained lowest after these transfers, his papers were next transferred. This result left the following six competitors for the two remaining places:—

Burt	1,903	Leif Jones ...	1,465
Cecil	926	Long	1,513
Henderson ...	2,279	Macdonald ...	2,660

It will be seen by comparison of these figures with those secured by the same candidates at the first count that Mr. Burt had received the biggest actual addition, raising him from fifth among the six to be third, while

Mr. Henderson and Mr. Leif Jones had received more than 1,000 apiece in transfers, and Lord Hugh Cecil had the least benefit in transferred votes. He was, indeed, left the lowest, and it became necessary to transfer his papers and then those of Mr. Leif Jones. This brought the candidates down to four, with the numbers of votes following:—

Henderson ...	2,829	Macdonald ...	2,851

Mr. Long, in spite of the numbers he received by transfer from Lord Hugh Cecil, remained lowest, and the next step was to distribute his papers. This was the most exciting point of the count. How would the Conservative supporters of Mr. Long indicate a preference among the other three candidates? It might be that not a few would indicate no further preference at all. The progress of the distribution was eagerly watched, and the result shows that more than 400 of Mr. Long's friends rallied to Mr. Burt, and brought him to the top of the three. It was unnecessary to go further. There were only two places to be filled, and as Mr. Henderson would have to be withdrawn, Mr. Burt and Mr. Ramsay Macdonald were left to fill the vacancies. The wishes of the voters as expressed by themselves on their voting-papers, which might be regarded as their wills and testaments, had been faithfully executed by the returning officer, and the final list of successful candidates corresponded, with as much accuracy as the conditions allowed, to the division of opinion among the electorate.

Burt	3,053	Macdonald ...	2,938
Henderson ...	2,910

An election with the machinery of the single transferable vote in a constituency returning several members is evidently easy enough. That is now past controversy. Doubters cease to insist upon the incapacity of voters, or the intricacy of the work of the returning officer. The citadel, however, is not won because the outworks are taken. The conservators of things as they are fall back upon the question of the utility or even inutility of the change. In a somewhat bewildered fashion they seem occasionally to doubt the value of representative government, and at all events are ready to submit that its worth must not be pushed too far. We have no security that representative government exists according to our present methods, since it is admitted that we may have, and have had, Governments supported by majorities in Parliament elected by a minority in the country. We must make a change if we wish to have any security that the nation is indeed self-governed. As to the question of an increase in the representative character of Parliament through the introduction of new elements in its composition, it must be insisted that these new elements corresponded to new developments of political opinion, which, despite all obstacles of our narrowly cut channels of entry into the House of Commons, have forced their way there, and will continue to grow. The real issue is whether they shall find a natural and co-operative entry instead, as the result of struggles, breeding reciprocal distrust and estrangement. Whatever we may do, the presence of three or four parties in future Parliaments must be taken as an accepted fact. But, it is asked, how can party government be carried on with such a change? Can any Ministers be found able to command and retain the support of a majority of the Legislative Chamber? The advocates of Proportional Representation claim that this reform will add new vitality to the electorate of the country through the certainty it affords that every adequate strain of opinion may find a voice in Parliament. They claim, also, that it will add authority and power to Members of Parliament, who will have an assurance of stable strength in the support of men whom they really represent, as exponents of political opinion. And assuredly the change will not leave the position of Ministers unaffected. It will make them also, paradoxical as it may seem, stronger in their position. Many will be the interpreters of the commanding judgment of the House of Commons for the time being, in which they will feel they find a trustworthy expression of the judgment of the country. Our Parliamentary history shows how in the past Ministers have sought for this inspiration and this strength; and the apparent inconsistencies which make Liberal Governments always accused of being retrograde by their own advanced friends, and Conservative Governments accused of being radical by their full-blooded Tory supporters, are explained by the fact that these men of affairs have been always searching for the support a really representative House of Commons can give.

I invite any man of courage and candor to think over the history of the past two years, and especially upon the conduct and present position of the controversy on popular education, and ask himself whether the Government of to-day would not have been stronger in conception and firmer in execution of their work if, instead of being backed by the enormous majority they now have behind them, they had really been supported by men diminished in number, whose clear convictions and authoritative position would give them what they have been trying to reach—a true presentment of the best will of the country. I might add many more words, but I forbear from more than one additional sentence. I invite the same candid and courageous observer to bethink himself what is the secret of the growing power of the House of Lords in face of the present House of Commons, and what would be the power of that House in face of a House which was really the mirror of the nation.

SIR EDWARD ELGAR'S SYMPHONY.

THE report that Elgar was engaged upon a symphony has been so many years in the air, that latterly people have come to disbelieve it. All classes of his admirers and detractors united in hoping that some day he would give his mind to a work of this order. Many held, in spite of the fact that "Gerontius" was easily his greatest work, that he was essentially an orchestral rather than a vocal writer. On the other hand, none of the orchestral compositions of his prime had indicated the one gift without which a symphony is impossible—the power of sustaining a prolonged musical flight. An early Serenade for Strings—too rarely heard nowadays—showed, in its short slow movement, a depth and refinement of passion which, one often thought, was an excellent study for some later symphonic slow movement on a larger scale; and there was promising work in the "Froissart" overture, also an early work. But from the three chief orchestral compositions of his central period one gradually formed the conviction that he was rather a miniaturist of graceful fancy and exquisite workmanship than a symphonist. Each section of the "Enigma" variations is a gem, but the work remains a collection of unrelated pictures, not an organic whole. In "Cockaigne" and "In the South," the invention is again fertile, and the manner often consummately polished; but neither overture hangs together very well. They are built, like the "Variations," in more or less rigid and non-communicating sections; they are like a series of cartoons on separate pieces of drawing-paper, which the composer had afterwards pasted together and enclosed in the one frame. Of course, this process did not make a unified picture of them; the tissues, though continuous, were not alive. Yet we needed only to look at some of Elgar's other work to see that he was in reality very much more than a miniaturist, a polisher and setter of isolated jewels. The miniaturist mind does not think out long works like "Gerontius," with their steady onward pressure of one great conception through an infinitude of carefully wrought detail. Even in "The Apostles," though its general musical interest was not as high as that of its predecessor, there was the same unmistakable breadth of architectural grasp. It was risky, therefore, to say positively that Elgar had not the sustained power of wing for a symphony; and it is just as well none of us did say it, for the work that has just been produced in Manchester and London would in that case have made us look rather foolish. For the most part, though it lasts no less than fifty-five minutes, it is unusually closely woven; and even where the texture becomes a little discontinuous, we get nothing of the impression of exhausted resource that we sometimes get in "Cockaigne" and "In the South."

We have become so used to symphonic poems and programme symphonies of recent years that most people are at once inclined to read a programme into any purely orchestral work that speaks a vital language to them. As some of Elgar's friends have been aware that at one time he contemplated a symphony with General Gordon as its poetic subject, two or three writers have jumped to the conclusion that this is the Gordon symphony. A single hearing of it, one thinks, ought to be enough to correct that delusion; but if it is not enough, we have the composer's positive assurance that this is not the Gordon work, the sketches for which, however, still exist. Nor need we even try to read into it, as has been done in one quarter, so inoffensive a poetic conception as that it is concerned with "the contrast between the ideal and the actual in life." The same might be said, with equal truth, of every musical work that is based on the alternation or interplay of themes that are gentle in character, and themes that are vigorous or urgent; the description would easily fit, for example, the C minor of Beethoven, as well as a score of other symphonies. If we are to have a programme at all to a work, let it be something definite enough to deserve the name; but this coy coquetting with a programme, these vague references to so universal an antithesis as that between reality and ideality, neither give the poetical imagination any support, nor add anything to the enjoyment the purely musical imagination feels in functioning along its own lines. The symphony is no mere formal exercise in the manipulation of themes. It plainly comes from vital life-experiences in the composer; but to respond to it we need no poetics and no metaphysics, but simply the emotional impressibility that contact with the joys and sorrows of life has generated in all of us. It is this quality in it and in us that makes its appeal so quick and so certain; anyone of ordinary sensibility of soul must feel at once that it is something both vivant and vécu.

The work is historically interesting, in that it represents the revolt of a living composer of genius both against the purely decorative pattern-weaving that leads music to emotional sterility, and against the excess of poetic or pictorial purpose that has latterly almost ruined music as a self-existent art. The poetic spirit, as Wagner saw, has been the great fertiliser of music in our own day; and having once come into music, it is hard to see how it can ever go out of it again, if the art is to be an expression of what men most deeply feel, and of the interest they take in the world around them. But the poetic spirit does not necessarily mean a poetic plan, either in the very definite form of the symphonic poem or the less definite form of programme symphonies like the No. 4 or No. 5 of Tchaikovski. Of the two, indeed, the more definite plan is, on the whole, preferable, provided the music be good. The adventures of Till Eulenspiegel or Don Quixote are durably interesting; whereas the vague poetic schemes of the "Fate" symphonies wear woefully thin with repetition. The more modern plan of Elgar is the better one—to write your music straight out of the heart of life, yet leave yourself free to develop it along the lines that best suit the material, unhampered by any programme. It is in this way that he gets a texture at once so free and so closely woven as that of the new symphony. Now and then, it is true, there is a slight disconnection, chiefly in the scherzo and the finale; but as a whole the work is knit with wonderful firmness. It has, like the fourth and fifth symphonies of Tchaikovski, a "motto theme" that opens the work, and rounds it off triumphantly at the finish; but the freedom of Elgar's manner of development enables him to put his theme to a score of subtle uses, to which there is no parallel in Tchaikovski. One phrase from it is perpetually appearing, always with the same unmistakable meaning, yet always in a new aspect, and welded most dexterously into the general fabric of the music. The symphony is, indeed, remarkable for the unity of impression it gives, in spite of the wide emotional field it covers. Besides this use of a central theme throughout the work, subsidiary themes from one movement recur in others, and the melody of the adagio is a note-for-note reproduction—of course, in different phrasing—of that of the scherzo. Here, perhaps, the intention is better than the achievement. I take it that it is really the scherzo that has been evolved from the adagio, not vice versâ. It is more likely that Elgar should have written the noble and beautiful slow movement, and then whipped the theme up into that of a scherzo, than that he should have written the theme in its rather inexpressive quick form, and then discovered that in a slower form it would make highly expressive music. Here, perhaps, the unity of the tissue does not quite compensate us for getting a scherzo theme inferior to what Elgar could no doubt have written under other circumstances. The gradual metamorphosis of the scherzo into the adagio is, however, admirable in every way, emotionally and technically. The thematic material of the symphony is refined and expressive almost throughout, perhaps the solitary exception being a theme in C sharp minor in the scherzo. What may be called the central theme of the work, the great melody that begins and ends it, is one of those rare things that seem to have more and more meaning in them each time we sing them to ourselves. I have no space in which to speak of some other interesting aspects of the symphony, such as the extremely beautiful and original orchestration. We shall have plenty of opportunities of hearing it, one hopes, and its many beauties will then tell their own tale to everyone. Meanwhile, we all congratulate Elgar on having at last broken a long silence with something so eloquent as this new work, and we look forward expectantly to its successor.

The Drama.

SUDERMANN AND HAUPTMANN.

THOUGH no very ardent admirer of Sudermann's genius, I must confess to preferring his version of "Heimat" (otherwise "Magda") to Mr. St. John Hankin's. "The Last of the De Mullins" is simply "Heimat" writ flippant—it is Sudermann transposed into the key of Shaw. Of course I am not so foolish as to accuse or suspect Mr. Hankin of plagiarism. Very likely he never saw or read "Magda": at any rate I am quite sure that if, in the course of working out "The Last of the De Mullins" he had realised how like it was growing to Sudermann's play, he would either have abandoned the theme, or developed it differently. No doubt he was quite taken by surprise when the resemblance was first pointed out to him. But there it is, manifest, obtrusive. Starting from the same germinal idea—the return of a rebellious daughter to her narrow, old-fashioned, fanatically conservative home—Mr. Hankin has tried to make a comedy out of what Sudermann has treated as a drama. Frankly, it seems to me much better fitted for serious than for semi-comic treatment. There is a shrillness, a sort of heartlessness, and, above all, a tactlessness in "The Last of the De Mullins" which, for my part, I found singularly unpleasing.

No doubt there are amusing scenes, and many touches of observation, in the play—for Mr. Hankin is unquestionably a very clever man. But there is no consecutive ten minutes in which the action strikes me as in the least like real life. The conventional characters are superficially studied, with more than a touch of caricature; and the unconventional character—the rebellious Janet—is not studied at all, but deduced from the author's preconceived notions as to how an emancipated woman who has kicked over the traces ought to feel and express herself. Janet is simply a Shaw heroine, reflected in a distorting mirror. I have hitherto thought the critics mistaken who saw in Mr. Hankin a disciple of Mr. Shaw; but Janet justifies them in every second word she utters. Even Mr. Shaw, however, would scarcely have made her quite so odious as she seems in certain passages of the last act. She made me positively sympathise with her incredible old noodle of a father, and still more with her ineffectual but far from unamiable mother. It is one thing to assert your independence, and quite another thing to run amuck among all the most cherished prejudices and superstitions of two old people, whom you cannot hope to convert, and can only outrage and pain. Sudermann's heroine had some excuse for her bitterness. Her father, an insane old martinet, wanted to force her into a detestable marriage, and to make her abandon her child. Old De Mullins, on the other hand, though unreasonable enough in all conscience, merely wants Janet to give up hat-making, and to let him adopt her illegitimate son, whom, in his foolish way, he loves. That she should decline is natural enough; but that she should decline with unmeasured contumely, and trample furiously on everything the old man holds dear, seems to me neither natural nor pleasing. Magda, with ten times the excuse, is not half so brutal as Janet. If emancipation carries with it such defects of temper and taste, my sympathies veer back to the unemancipated type of woman, who does not think it a particularly fine achievement to have given herself, without ceremony, to a chance young man with whom she had "collided" on her bicycle.

And oh! the tactlessness of the dialogue in all the more difficult scenes! The characters seem to go out of their way to say everything that had much better be unsaid, and, if possible, unfelt. There was scarcely a line in the scene between Janet and her ex-lover that did not make me writhe in my seat; but one speech of that gallant officer's stood out from all the rest as the very acme of unbelievable inappropriateness, to use no harsher word. I shall not quote it, but merely say that it occurs where Monty is watching little Johnny playing in the wood. Almost equally painful was the scene that followed between Janet and her mother; and, after all, nothing came of it. On the other hand, the best and most human passage in the play was the little scene between Janet and her sister in the third act. Indeed, the whole character of Hester was cleverly touched in.

In the vehement scenes of the last act, Miss Lillah McCarthy was quite admirable. In the earlier acts she was not very convincing; but that was mainly because the author had given her unconvincing things to do, and the stage manager had, in some difficult passages, done little or nothing to help her. Miss Adela Measor was delightful as the mother; Miss Amy Lamborn was very clever as the sister; and Miss M. Murray showed a real sense of character as the aunt. The men of the cast were less remarkable; but Mr. H. A. Saintsbury gave a careful study of the father, Mr. Nigel Playfair was an amusing curate, and Mr. Vernon Steel was in no way to blame for the intolerable impression made by the ex-lover.

As I have no interest in "Hannele," and was in no way concerned in its staging, there seems to be no reason why I should not speak my mind quite freely about it. That very praiseworthy enterprise, the Afternoon Theatre (at His Majesty's) could scarcely have opened with a more interesting play. The only wonder is that we should have had so long to wait for it, seeing it was produced fifteen years ago, and has been immensely popular at all the leading theatres in Germany.

It is simply a piece of child-psychology, the feverdream of a dying girl. The German stage of the new century has gone much further in the way of child-psychology, in Wedekind's morbid and terrible "Frühlings-Erwachen"; but I venture to think that "Hannele," which is neither morbid nor terrible, is the greater and more enduring poem of the two. I see no reason why it should not repeat in England its German success; for it has wherewithal to please all classes of playgoers. For simple souls it has pathos and pietism; it is the death of a more modern Little Nell. For those, again, who can look beneath its surface, it is a marvellously ingenious transcript or projection of the queer, heterogeneous contents of a girl-child's mind, just at the first stirring of womanhood. Its painfulness is merged in its poetry. After all, it is a euthanasia we witness; and there is no reason to doubt its essential truth, even from the pathological point of view. Poor little Hannele has suffered terribly in the past; but this is the end of her sufferings, and the realisation, be it only for a moment, of her dreams.

> "Sleepe after toyle, port after stormie seas, > Ease after warre, death after life, does greatly please."

The little play is, on the whole, admirably presented at His Majesty's. One could not desire a better Hannele than Miss Marie Löhr, who was perfectly simple and childlike, and yet thoroughly adequate to the emotional requirements of the part. Miss Marie Linden is excellent as the Nurse-Mother, and Mr. Henry Ainley is good, though perhaps a little too seraphic, as the Schoolmaster of Hannele's waking moments. When, in her dream, the Schoolmaster merges in the Saviour, a ridiculous restriction on the part of the Censor forbade Mr. Ainley to indicate the idea in his make-up. Whether it was on this account, or for some other reason, I cannot say, but the concluding scene somehow moved me not a whit. Mr. Ainley, with his cold, clear-cut stern countenance, coldly reciting the long passages of verse, did not seem a possible part of any child's dream. There was a total lack of tenderness, of childlikeness, in the whole scene. This was not poor Hannele's Lord Jesus come to take her home: it was rather a Renaissance Archangel, and not a particularly affable one. I do not think the fault was wholly Mr. Ainley's; but certainly the passage wants working at; its difficulties have not been mastered.

Two other matters seem to call for criticism: the Angel of Death is singularly ineffective, both in pose and action; and Mr. Sass, as Hannele's Stepfather, is far too burly and respectable-looking—he ought to be a sodden, repulsive wreck. Otherwise, the minor parts were excellently filled (though the scene of the little tailor, by the way, scarcely got over the footlights), and the apparitions and other scenic effects were exceedingly well managed. But why, in the name of wonder, was applause prohibited after the fall of the curtain? During the performance it would scarcely have occurred to anyone to applaud; but at the close, where was the objection? Had the celestial bodies presented on the stage purported (so to speak) to be real, one could better have understood it; but as they were only the phantasms of a child's delirium, why should the management have gone out of its way to give the production the air of a religious solemnity?

THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE SMALL HOLDINGS ACT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I venture to think that Mr. Morrell's indictment of Lord Carrington and of the Board of Agriculture for their administration of the Small Holdings Act is much to be regretted. No one doubts Mr. Morrell's sincerity or his real desire to help the rural population to rise to a position of greater independence, and to obtain free access to the land on which they work, but it is open to doubt whether his object is in any way served by the publication of such an article as appeared in THE NATION of November 28th.

From the party point of view nothing can be more unfortunate than to create a general impression in the public mind that the Act is not proving a success and that the Government are not in earnest about it. It is commonly said that the fortunes of the Liberal Party in the rural districts are bound up with the success or failure of the Small Holdings Act, and if the electors are constantly told by Liberal Members that the whole thing is a hopeless failure, those who are responsible for spreading this impression must not be surprised if their constituents take them at their word and withdraw their confidence from them. It has usually been considered wiser policy to leave to our opponents the work of attempting to damage and discredit the prestige of the Government and of the legislation they have passed.

But I will assume that Mr. Morrell cares nothing for the fortunes of his party, or his own—that he takes as his motto, "Ruat coelum, fiat justitia," and that he is willing to submit to political extinction at the next election for the sake of his principles. Even so, it still becomes necessary to inquire whether his indictment has any foundation in fact. His principal count appears to be that the Board of Agriculture have wilfully misinterpreted the plain words of the Act and have thereby defeated the intention of Parliament. He tells us that it is with the Commissioners and not with the Councils that the primary responsibility rests, and he complains that the Commissioners have not even begun to carry out some of the plain duties laid upon them. The whole trend of his article creates the impression that it was the intention of Parliament that the Act should be worked direct from Whitehall and that the County Councils need not do anything until the Commissioners had ascertained the demand, made their reports to the Board and called upon the Councils to prepare schemes.

Leaving out of consideration the fact that if this course had been adopted, it would have been impossible for an army of Commissioners to have completed their enquiries into the extent of the demand by now, and that the provision of small holdings would have been most seriously delayed, it must be pointed out that it is Mr. Morrell, and not the Board, who has misinterpreted the Act. There is nothing in the speeches of those responsible for the Bill in either House to justify Mr. Morrell's argument. Indeed, the reverse is the case. In introducing the Bill, Mr. Harcourt said:—

"We proceed upon the assumption that the existing local authorities, the borough, and county councils, are the most convenient bodies to provide and to manage small holdings where they are willing or can be induced to do so. In the event of their default, action will be taken to this end by Commissioners appointed under the Board of Agriculture," and, again, on second reading, he said: "When they (the County Councils) are not able, or where they will not attempt to discover a demand, the Commissioners will do the work for them."

In the Second Reading debate in the House of Lords, Lord Carrington said: "The main objects of the Bill are three—first, to establish a central authority to organise the general administration of these Acts; secondly, to put pressure on County Councils who are unwilling to take action of their own accord; and, thirdly, to give further facilities for the provision of small holdings, to be leased, and not sold."

The effect of these speeches, taken with the words of the Act, shows that the County Councils were to be primarily responsible for the provision of small holdings, and that they should act in co-operation with the Commissioners and the Board of Agriculture, and that the duty of the Commissioners to take independent action does not arise until the County Councils are in default.

This is the procedure which has been followed in administering the Act. Acting under the powers of Section 2 (2) of the Act, the Commissioners have called upon the County Councils for information and assistance in ascertaining the demand, and no one can doubt that on the whole the work has been carried out with much greater expedition, and at the same time much more thoroughly than could have been done by the Commissioners alone without the co-operation of the local authorities.

But, after all, the real question is whether the desire of Parliament that all suitable applicants should obtain small holdings at the earliest possible date is being accomplished in the spirit as well as in the letter. Now, no one will deny that many County Councils took up the work without enthusiasm, and, in some cases, with reluctance; but it is also true to say that at the present time, with few exceptions, they are doing their best to carry out the intentions of Parliament without any unavoidable delay.

It is really a gross perversion of the facts to represent as a failure an Act under which in nine months from its coming into operation 15,000 acres have been acquired for small holdings. It cannot be described as anything but real and substantial progress when it is borne in mind that the greater part of the time has been occupied in sifting the applications which at the commencement of the movement are necessarily far more numerous than they will be in future years. Mr. Morrell must be fully aware of the great difficulty in obtaining land in view of the keen demand for farms all over the country, and of the still greater difficulty of obtaining the particular land which will satisfy the applicants. He cannot wish that sitting tenants who are farming their land well should be ruthlessly evicted, and yet this must be the only possible method of providing at once for all the suitable applicants. What is being carried out is nothing less than a rural revolution, and it is surely important in the interests of the small holders themselves that the revolution should be a peaceful one. Those who are best qualified to judge are confident that the work is being done as quickly as is possible without inflicting hardship on existing occupiers of land.—Yours, &c.,

Letters to the Editor.

"FIGHT OR ABDICATE!"

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In your issue of to-day Mr. H. H. Robson proposes that the Government should fight the House of Lords by "making every Bill a money Bill"—the result of which would be that the House of Lords would throw out every Money Bill, and would be perfectly justified in doing so.

Surely the situation is much too serious to be met by tricks. The only way of salvation lies in looking facts in the face. The letter of the Constitution has always given the House of Lords the power to reduce a Liberal Government to impotence, whenever it cared or dared to exercise that power. Unless we can get the letter of the Constitution altered we are doomed to extinction as a party.

Englishmen are slow at grasping the importance of Constitutional issues, and we must be prepared to be beaten at first. But when people realise that the only alternative is an incompetent plutocracy, there are forces in the country strong enough to carry us to ultimate victory. The important thing is that we should begin the struggle at once, and the Licensing Bill raises the question in a clearer and more definite form than a rejected Budget or any other rejected Bill is likely to do. Every month's delay is now sheer loss. We must realise that unless government can be freed from the tyranny of wealth, the country, as well as the party, is doomed.—Yours, &c.,

G. F. Bradby.

Rugby, December 5th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The rank and file of Liberals will be mainly with you in your call for fighting leadership on the Constitutional issue between the Lords and the Commons. A policy of acquiescence in lordly arrogance will be fatal to organised Liberalism, because it will dishearten sincere reformers. If an early dissolution means defeat for the Ministry, that is a small matter compared with the political suicide which is the only alternative; but it is not at all certain that a fighting policy would fail even in England. In Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, of course, Liberalism has nothing to fear if it stands firm and fights boldly. Possibly England needs a brief experience of tariffism to convince her that its promises are vain delusions, and that its only results will be injurious to industry, trade, and social well-being; if so, the sooner she gets it the better. The way will then be clear for thorough progress if, in the meantime, Liberals make up their minds regarding a policy on the Constitutional issue.

It is agreed that we must put this issue before the country in the form of definite proposals embodied in a Bill. You suggest that the late Premier's scheme should be so embodied, but I am becoming more and more convinced that this will never do. That scheme had too much of the appearance of tinkering with the question, and could not arouse any fighting enthusiasm in the country. The referendum offers a far better and far easier solution. It is, indeed, highly probable that the Lords could be induced even next Session to accept a Bill for submitting measures disputed between the two Houses to a direct vote of the whole body of electors. At least, if they rejected such a measure, they would have openly abandoned all pretence of being exponents of the real mind of the country, and would have definitely taken their stand on privilege against the popular will. The Government would then have an immensely strong position in the appeal to the country. Moreover, if the referendum became a part of our Constitutional machinery, a period of Tory rule would have fewer terrors, provided that it were introduced in such a form as to enable Liberals to demand a popular vote on keenly disputed measures, such as a Tariff Bill. As things are, the Government may dissolve on the question of the Lords, and then the electors will discuss Tariff Reform. The issues at the next election threaten to be overwhelmingly complex—Free Trade, the Lords, Woman Suffrage, Home Rule, Licensing, Education, &c. The result under such circumstances can hardly be conclusive on any question.—Yours, &c.,

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In reading the articles upon the "House of Lords," in your paper, and also in the "Daily News," and other papers of a Liberal complexion, one seems to feel an influence which cannot be accounted for by the facts upon which those articles are based. The Lords reject important Bills sent up to them by the Commons. They have done that before. But they have been compelled to pass several measures which have been rejected by them in the past, and the inference seems to be plain—that they may be made to pass measures which they now reject and by the same means. It is just here where a sense of hopelessness and forlornness seems to come in; and one wonders why? Speeches of politicians, leaders of editors, magazine articles, all betray the same uneasy and half-boding sense of impotence. How does this come in? Our Parliamentary leaders seem all right—men of ability and courage, and, as far as one can judge, resourceful as any set of leaders could be. It may be that their silence is but the silence that precedes the application of the match to the mine. It cannot be that they do not know how the country burns with indignation at recent events. Yet the absence of leading or utterance strikes one dumb with a nameless terror. Do they know that heroic remedies would not be allowed? We want to get to the heart of this thing. When we do we may be enabled to direct our energies into right and effective channels of change.—Yours, &c.,

J. G. VOICE.

Riverdale, Evesham,

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—While every Liberal will heartily agree with you in saying that we must either fight or abdicate, a great many Liberals heartily disagree with you in urging an immediate or early appeal to the country.

The Liberal Party must go back to the policy advocated by Lord Rosebery in 1895.

The Lords either reject or cripple Liberal Bills. They can and do discredit a Liberal Government by forcing on them the necessity either of adopting a policy of compromise or of abdicating their legislative functions.

Hitherto the rank and file of our party have been urgent in pushing the claims of particular reforms. We must agree for the time being to waive our favorite Bills. The constitution of both Houses of Parliament must be amended so as to secure the supremacy of the popular will. The watchword for the future must be: "Concentration!"

In Mr. Asquith we have a Premier and leader who can, and, if I mistake not, will, adopt a well-thought out, bold, and yet discreet, policy calculated to carry out this object.

The general body of moderate and sane electors are slow to see the necessity of Constitutional changes, and it takes time and strong evidence to convince them. They resent premature or rash measures. Fortunately impatience and impetuosity are foreign to Mr. Asquith's nature, and we may trust his judgment, backed by the remarkable band of able men he has gathered round him.

We must not press individual views, but we may, without offence, point out what, to many of us, seems the line of least resistance.

To reform the House of Lords will necessitate a complicated and difficult Bill, full of highly disputable points, and open to furious obstruction, and may easily result in adding strength to that body. A comparatively simple and short Bill, providing for a Referendum to the whole country, would be intelligible to "the man in the street," and would obviate any fear of a chance majority passing measures which are really contrary to the wishes of the people.

To sum up, the next General Election must be fought on the general principle: whether the will of the people shall prevail.

To dissolve on any one or more measures, such as Bills on Licensing, Education, or the Land Question, would obscure the main issue Moreover, the difficulty would only be postponed. We must concentrate on a real and permanent solution.

Let the Government, in the next Session, introduce a measure of electoral reform and redistribution of seats, and also a measure dealing in some effective way with the veto of the House of Lords. These Bills will no doubt be thrown out. Let the party accept the issue and appeal to the country in 1910.—Yours, &c.,

HENRY J. SOUTHALL.

THE CABINET AND THE SUFFRAGETTES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—A somewhat disingenuous assertion by Miss E. Sylvia Pankhurst in your last issue that I "condemn in the most vehement terms" the "old-established policy of putting questions and protesting against the speeches of Cabinet Ministers," prompts me to ask you to insert a correction. What I condemned was exclusively the proposed interruption of Mr. Lloyd George under the new and original circumstances of the Albert Hall meeting. As I remarked in the letter in "Votes for Women," to which Miss Pankhurst refers, Mr. Lloyd George came under a flag of truce, and blindly to follow a course of tactics under any circumstances was a mark rather of animal instinct than of human reason. I also pointed out privately to one of the militant generals that a general was hopelessly incompetent who would deliver battle when he must inevitably do more damage to his own troops than to the enemy. Had the interruptions to Mr. Lloyd George followed upon his comparatively unsatisfactory announcement, there would have been some logic in them, but to hiss and heckle a man who may be bearing good tidings of great joy is simply senseless. If anything, however, could justify the folly of the Women's Social and Political Union, it would be the Gilbertian principle of the British Government, under which the fact that the Parliamentary majority in favor of a measure belongs to both sides of the House is the chief obstacle to its adoption. Is the object of legislation, then, simply to annoy the other side? We cannot wonder that women to whom suffrage is a religion should be impatient of these absurdities of the party system.

Miss Sylvia Pankhurst also says that my claim to be "the first man publicly to approve the militant tactics" is "not quite true." The point is trivial, and as Miss Sylvia Pankhurst has been publishing what seems an admirable history of the movement, I bow to her authority. All I know of the matter is that a couple of years ago newspaper readers were startled by a militant act, apparently the first, and the "Times" remarked that women had now conclusively shown their unfitness for political life. Instantly I wrote to that newspaper—with citations from history—that, on the contrary, women had at last shown they understood how to make British politics. It is almost inconceivable that the "Times," in its leader of to-day (December 7th) should have the audacity to repeat that "this Albert Hall meeting provides the last and most conspicuous of many similar examples of the incapacity of the Women Suffragists to exercise the political rights which they demand." And this with the militant element only about one per cent. of the audience of nine thousand! It was only the other day that I read in my "Times" of the male rioting at Chelmsford and the wounding of the Liberal agent. Not to mention that even to-day it tells us of male militants at the Albert Hall meeting, one of whom "fought quite as desperately as any of the women." But the unfitness of men for politics I have already demonstrated in its own columns.

Finally, let me point out that the rejection of the Licensing Bill and the unparalleled impotence of the Cabinet before the House of Lords are the just nemesis for the Liberal Party's failure in its great Gladstonian period to give votes to that sex whose suffrage has invariably been exercised for temperance legislation and social reform.—Yours, &c.,

THE PROGRESS OF WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—There is a side to the militant suffragist movement that is not generally understood. Here in London we are in a small circle of opinion, led by politicians and daily journalists; and painful scenes in the Albert Hall or trifling offences to the dignity of Members of Parliament seem to matter desperately. Outside this little circle, things have a different proportion.

The great achievement of the militant movement is to have created or brought together women of a new type, young (that is the chief thing), able, and self-dependent, and the temporary "violence" is only a very superficial affair in comparison with this. Nobody can know what this means who has not seen and understood the terrible struggles, sometimes successful or half-successful, sometimes vain, which have been going on so quietly during my generation and the last. I mean, the struggles of women for education, for freedom to live their own lives, for escape from monstrous unneeded sacrifices to parents and relations, to meaningless conventional ideas, and "social duties." In industry the incapacity of women to unite and resist, to make a standard of their own, has been the despair of everyone except the employers of cheap labor; and in marriage women have been worse than in any other relation, because they have been too weak to bring about any general acceptance of a wholesome equality between husband and wife. The new young women seem to be strong and free without any struggle or sourness. I suppose they are the daughters of the struggles of the last two generations; and they ought to be as welcome to us older women as water in drought.

During the Chelmsford election contest, I spent a few days with the Women's Freedom League among a number of these young "militant" women. The London newspapers said there were suffragists in the town, but that no one took them seriously. That was quite untrue. The audiences in halls and village schoolrooms were mostly of the lower middle class and the more prosperous working class, and, of course, there was a large proportion of poorer women and laborers at the many street-corner meetings. They were almost always quite quiet and attentive, and, as a rule, decidedly sympathetic. This was not entirely due to Mid-Essex Toryism, for at a meeting in the Chelmsford Co-operative Society's hall, where I had the pleasure of hearing Miss Molony, there were many co-operators present, and they, I was told, were almost all Liberals, as co-operators are everywhere. Miss Molony, who passes for a mad girl with a bell, made one of the most remarkable speeches I ever heard—able, thoughtful, restrained, and eloquent—not about policy, which is rather boring, but about women's suffrage. And the audience listened with sympathy and approval, though the anti-Government policy of the League had been explained by the chairman. Another day she addressed a large audience, mainly of men, this time speaking plainly about sex morality, and was listened to seriously and attentively for an hour and a quarter. This lady belongs to a type, one which is, I think, worth the price of a little quite temporary inconvenience from bells and such-like.

I can, I hope, speak impartially about these societies, because I should not say, as some, but not all, of the militants do, that "all is fair in war," and because I happen to be shut out from membership of every woman's suffrage society in the country by a certain paper that always comes up for signature. It is the pledge to those "same terms as men." As I belong to a society of married working women, and as we are always asking for the vote, this abominable little paper makes me an outcast.—Yours, &c.,

THE SPEECH OF THE PROVINCE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Albert Campbell says that "a Londoner, even when educated, appears to prefer to say . . . 'an heretical opinion.'" Why does Mr. Campbell say "a Londoner"? May I suggest that the pronunciation which he dislikes is classical, and the usage of "the best people"? I can quote against him a countryman of his own. The late Professor Lewis Campbell once expressed to me his regret that there was a tendency to ignore the difference between "a history," where the first syllable is stressed, and "an historical work," where it is not. He thought that "historical" ought to be pronounced with a slight aspirate, but admitted, on my putting it to him, that, unless the word stood at the beginning of a sentence, such men as the third Lord Holland and Lord John Russell showed, in their pronunciation of such words, no trace of the aspirate. Nor ought we.—Yours, &c.,

MORE MESSAGES FROM MYERS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In reply to the letter of Mr. Edward Clodd, I can answer all his queries affirmatively. I am well aware of all the facts he states.

The failure of the experiment with the sealed letter left with Sir Oliver Lodge was indeed expressly described in my communication to your pages on September 19th, which Mr. Clodd has evidently not seen. Such a failure was disappointing, and it has had a certain sensational publicity; but, after all, there can be no reasonable wonder that the attempt did not succeed. We are ignorant of the conditions on the other side; and any experiment framed here must take its chance of being adapted to changes in earth memory caused by death. From the difficulty found in other experiments in the emergence of particular words asked for, it looks as though the multitudinous facts that we superficially acquire—our habitual stock of names and dates, of when and where—did not persist anything like so well as leading ideas and motives, thoughts and causes, which have affected us more deeply. But we await light from further experiment, as scientific inquirers should. Let it be remembered that the important fact is that anything at all comes through; it is not required that everything shall do so to order. The proper course for a critic is, therefore, to criticise the evidence presented, not that not presented.

Secondly, I am thoroughly familiar with "Miss Beauchamp's" case, and with many other cases of multiple personality. They are, indeed, almost famous. But Mr. Clodd does not indicate what he thinks they have to do with messages from Myers. To my mind, these abnormalities disclose a wealth of variety and a complexity of content in the seemingly clear unit of self, which make its continuance after death easier rather than harder to accept.

Thirdly, like everyone else, I am aware of the morphological continuity between men and animals. This difficulty, if it be a difficulty, holds against all belief in survival of death, however supported, not specially against this evidence. But we must follow whither facts lead us, regardless of how they will affect our other theories, or whither their implications will carry us. Mr. Clodd will agree with this, I think. He would not wish to fall back upon the methods of those who have opposed him through all his scientific career on the ground of the shock his views give to other doctrines. Men of science must not erect a notice-board of their own, like the one presented to Darwin and Huxley: "No road this way. By order. Moses." As to the survival of the higher mammals, our research will perhaps throw the first real light that has ever fallen upon that time-honored query. We have records of phantasmal dogs, not very numerous, but as well authenticated as other narratives; the latest a very good one by Mr. Rider Haggard (not, however, in his capacity as a writer of fiction). It will be a question whether the phantasm of a dog is part of the dog's own self, or the projection of some living mind. I hold a view, but its discussion would be irrelevant, as, indeed, the whole introduction of the survival of animals is.

I think Mr. Clodd uses the language of exaggeration when he speaks of "the fundamental identity of the mental apparatus in man and the higher mammals." As a student of mathematics I disapprove of the loose use of the sacred word "identity." He goes on to speak of "unbroken continuity" revealed by "comparative psychology." On the contrary, I believe the continuity to be very much broken—broken at the gap which separates the brain of man from that of his nearest animal relatives. Our brains are five times the size of the largest ape brain, and far more corrugated; the human infant four months before birth has a brain equal to that of the adult baboon. The fact is that ever since man first stood erect his development has been almost wholly cerebral; and on that he has built the family, sympathy, public spirit, conscious effort to aid the creative purpose, education, and all that makes him man. He has superseded the brute law of the survival of the fittest as the engine of improvement, by effort, by co-operation, by mental training, and so has progressed so rapidly as he has. That this great mental construction should be potent enough to survive the separation from its material base is most probable, and should bespeak favorable attention to any available evidence for it.

I am at a loss to know where I "confused the abnormal with the 'supernatural.'" But I believe that it is by studying the abnormal or the supernormal that knowledge grows, as the geologist learns about the earth's crust from the study of cracks and faults, quarries and mines. Meantime, any criticism of the actual evidence will be gladly welcomed. —Yours, &c.,

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—After I had read Mr. Graham's letter on Myers in THE NATION of last Saturday week, I opened Myers' "Wordsworth," and read there Myers' own words that "only when the veil of his personality has lifted from around him can he recognise that he is already in heaven."

Are not these words of his more convincing than the psychical gymnastics of Mr. Piddington and Mrs. Verrall? —Yours, &c.,

COUNTY COUNCILS AND THE SMALL HOLDING'S ACT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Having toured England during the Autumn of last year and the winter of this year explaining the Small Holdings Act, I can speak of the genuine interest created in, and by, the Act. Men walked miles to attend meetings, and left them with a new hope burning bright in their hearts.

The last few months I have been touring the country again, and I have found, much to my dismay, these same men despondent and hopeless

Why this change? Why have these men lost hope?

Mr. Morrell in his admirable article gave the reasons. I would that I could cross swords with him. I wish I could dispute and disprove his statements and charges. Unfortunately I cannot. They are only too true.

Many of the men that applied have lost, or are losing, hope. They have staked their life on their application, and they know only too well that if they are not successful, if they do not get the land, that they will be in a worse position than they were before. It is difficult to bring definite proof, but yet one knows that some of these men have already suffered because they have made application for land. Petty tyranny and boycott are not unknown even in so-called free England.

The men in a number of villages blame the Board of Agriculture. They never had much hope of their County Councils doing them justice, but they trusted the Board, and placed implicit faith in Lord Carrington. I would not for a moment question the sincerity of Lord Carrington. I know, personally, that his great desire is to make the Act a complete success. But these men do not know him personally, and their trust in him is weakening.

That distinct and direct hostility is being shown to the Act by some of its administrators cannot be denied. Methods of procrastination and needless harassing of applicants, the putting of impertinent questions, and the prying into private affairs, are all indications of this unpatriotic un-British spirit.

The inaction of the Board seems to signify approval of these slow methods of torture. This acquiescence in protracting methods means a baulking of progress and a thwarting of the purpose of the Act. Actions, not words, are a true criterion of the earnestness and sincerity of conviction and resolution. It is sincerely to be hoped that the present uneasiness, and the unsatisfactory impressions created, will be speedily removed by a demonstration on the part of the Board of Agriculture that they intend to bring pressure upon the recalcitrant and phlegmatic County Councils, and by this means prevail over those whose actions are tending to minimise and nullify the possible far-reaching effects of the Act.

Also, it is indispensable if the Act is going to achieve the success hoped for, if the anticipations of its promoters and supporters are to become practical realisations, that not only must we have a wide-awake Board of Agriculture, generous, patriotic, and ingenious County Councils, but also a resolute determination on the part of all interested in the rural regeneration of England to see that the Act becomes a living reality.—Yours, &c.,

Poetry.

THE HOLY NIGHT.

(From the German.)

STILL is the night, the holy night;
While all things sleep, their lone watch keep Holy Joseph, and Mary fair;
Dear little Boy, with the curly silk hair,
Sleep Thou to-night!

Still is the night, the holy night;
The shepherds hear the message clear,
And angels singing in the skies;
Dear little Boy, with the sunny blue eyes,
Sleep Thou to-night!

Still is the night, the holy night;
The longed-for Birth is seen on earth,
Now is striking the world's great hour;
Dear little Boy, with the face like a flower,
Sleep Thou to-night!

R. L. GALES.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE great literary event of the week has been the celebration of the tercentenary of Milton's birth. On Tuesday, Dr. Ward, representing the British Academy, read a paper on "Milton's Life and Work," and this was followed by the recital of a poem specially written for the occasion by Mr. George Meredith and full of sonorous phrasing and of the critical power which all Mr. Meredith's literary poetry possesses. Sir Frederick Bridge delivered an address on "Milton and Music," which was illustrated by the performance of selections from the incidental music written by Henry Lawes for the first performance of "Comus." On Wednesday a special service was held in Bow Church, Cheapside, and a sermon preached by the Bishop of Ripon, while a number of papers on various aspects of Milton's work were read before the British Academy. The proceedings had dignity, and approached in impressiveness the great national literary celebrations which the French nation organises. It is in the management of such celebrations rather than in any attempt to legislate in literary matters, or to mark certain books for special honor, that the British Academy best justifies its existence. In one respect, the Milton tercentenary differs from most celebrations of a like nature. We have had no fresh biography of Milton. But this is not to be regretted, since there is Professor Masson's great work which, despite Lowell's strictures, is a noble monument to the poet's memory, and there is little of value to be gleaned in the fields which Masson has reaped. For those who require a biography of more manageable size, there are Mark Pattison's and Professor Raleigh's books, or the excellent little volume by Dr. Stopford Brooke in the "Classical Writers" series.

ANOTHER event of importance in the world of books has been the sale of the first portion of Lord Amherst of Hackney's great library. The withdrawal of the Caxtons—which were seventeen in number, eleven perfect—did something to lessen the interest in the sale But the Amherst Collection was so rich in bibliographical treasures that its dispersal must rank among the famous English book-auctions. The prices realised have been good, in many cases showing a great advance upon what was originally paid. While regretting the misfortune—due, we believe, in the main to the dishonesty of a solicitor—that has forced Lord Amherst to dispose of his library, we do not share the lament often uttered when a famous collection of books comes to the hammer. It is a good thing that even treasured copies should go back into circulation from time to time and form part of what Mr. Birrell calls "the great tidal wave of literature which is for ever breaking on Earth's human shores."

THE first volumes in a new series of critical biographies bearing the title "Les Grands Ecrivains Européens" will be issued in the spring by Messrs. Bloud of Paris. The list of contributors is a strong one, including MM. Mæterlinck, Edouard Rod, Maurice Barrès, Henri Brémond, E. Legouis, Firmin Roz, and Henri Lichtenberger. Both M. Legouis and M. Brémond have done useful work in English literary criticism. "The Early Life of William Wordsworth" by the former is a fresh and authoritative study of the influence of the French Revolution upon Wordsworth's development, while M. Brémond's "The Mystery of Newman" has also appeared in English with a preface by Father Tyrrell. We understand that arrangements have been made for an English edition of some of the volumes in the series.

MR. J. B. ATLAY, the author of "The Victorian Chancellors," has just finished a "Life of Lord Haliburton," which will be published early next year by Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. Lord Haliburton was a distinguished civil servant, who became Permanent Under-Secretary for War —and one of the ablest and not the least combative of the civilians who have managed the British Army. He was a staunch Cardwellian, and many readers of the "Times" will recall his exemplary dealings with Mr. Arnold Forster in a series of letters that followed his retirement. A man of considerable wealth, Lord Haliburton was one of the dozen most famous entertainers of his day, and his dinner-parties in the house in Lowndes-square were interesting and distinguished. His father, Chief Justice Haliburton, was the author of "Sayings and Doings of Sam Slick," a book which laid the foundations in America of humorous literature in dialect.

NEXT week the Cambridge University Press will publish a selection from the sermons of Henry Smith, "the silver-tongued preacher" of Elizabethan days, edited, with an introduction, by Dr. John Brown. Smith was, in his day, reckoned "the prime preacher of the nation," and Anthony Wood calls him "the miracle and wonder of his age." His sermons have been classed as fine specimens of English prose, free "from the besetting vices of the age—vulgarity and quaintness and affected learning."

THE same publishers will early in the New Year issue a further instalment of "The Cambridge History of English Literature." It is called "The Renascence and Reformation," and, besides the literature of the early Tudor age, it will treat of the changes in the English language from Chaucer to the time of Shakespeare. On January 6th the eleventh volume of "The Cambridge Modern History" will be published. We understand that the sixth volume, "The Eighteenth Century," is also well advanced, and will be issued during the first half of next year.

MOST readers who are not specialists in ecclesiastical history have but the vaguest notion of the state of the Roman Catholic Church in England during the period between the repeal of the Penal Laws and the beginning of the Oxford Movement. A large tract of this ground is covered by Mr. Bernard Ward in a book called "The Dawn of the Catholic Revival in England, 1781-1803," which Messrs. Longmans have in the press. Mr. Ward begins by describing the condition of English Catholicism in the years following the death of Bishop Challoner in 1781, a period which he describes as "the low-water mark of English Catholicity, when apathy and helplessness reigned supreme." He then sets out the causes of the unexpected revival in the early nineteenth century, making use for this purpose of the documents preserved in the chief Roman Catholic Colleges and religious houses. The book deals with a deeply interesting epoch in religious history, and is sure to be welcomed by many who do not share Mr. Ward's faith.

WHILE England is celebrating Milton's tercentenary, a group of French men of letters are attempting to raise funds in order to erect a statue to Barbey d'Aurevilly, in commemoration of the hundredth anniversary of his birth, which falls due this month. Barbey d'Aurevilly was towards the end of his life one of the most noted and noticeable frequenters of the Parisian boulevards. He expressed his attitude, made up of Catholicism, dandyism, iconoclasm, and what Carlyle, writing of Baudelaire, called "the bright infernal," in a number of works which, though hardly suited for general reading, are often entertaining enough. The Société du Mercure de France has issued a volume of selections, "L'Esprit de Barbey d'Aurevilly," consisting of characteristic thoughts and judgments, arranged in alphabetical order. It is a pity that Barbey d'Aurevilly is chiefly known in this country by such works as the "Diaboliques," which, though full of cleverness, do not represent his real critical power and gift of style.

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY OXFORD.*

There are one or two famous verdicts on eighteenth century Oxford which everybody remembers. Magdalen has paid a heavy price for the honor of counting Gibbon among her sons, and if Adam Smith had never been an undergraduate at Balliol the reputation of that distinguished college would in one sense have stood higher. It is, indeed, a nice question whether a University can claim credit for those of its sons who think they owe her nothing; whether, for example, we are called upon to thank Queen's for Bentham or Christ Church for Wesley, seeing that Bentham himself declared that most tutors or professors of his day were profligate or insipid, and that the University showed very little mercy to the followers of Wesley. There are cases, indeed, like that of Shelley, in which it would be clearly ridiculous to allow such a claim, but Mr. Godley points out in his extremely interesting study that the Oxford which we most of us know through the picture of a Gibbon produced after all a Butler, a Routh, and a Blackstone, and that Berkeley described it as an ideal retreat for learning. And if throughout the century honor schools were unknown, the discipline and régime of the seven years' course prescribed by Laud's Statutes were in abeyance and Pass degrees signified even less than they do to-day, there was some attempt made before its close to reform the government and the teaching of the University. From certain important points of view, on which we shall have something to say later, the University took a retrograde step during the century, but from the point of view of efficiency some improvement may be recorded. Honor examinations were invented though not introduced before the end of the century. On the other hand, professorial teaching was at a low ebb and the chair of Moral Philosophy was always held by one of the Proctors.

Mr. Godley gives us a graphic picture of the life and customs of the colleges. By the opening of the century these institutions had drifted very far from the dreams of their founders. Fellows were no longer ascetic and industrious, and endowments designed to open the riches of learning to the poor and the pious were treated as permanent pensions for indolence. Not that Fellowships were in all or very many cases opulent sinecures. Mr. Godley calculates that a Fellow could live fairly well for about £100 a year, and in many cases the direct emoluments of a Fellowship fell short of this figure. But then these emoluments were supplemented by pickings of different kinds, and a Fellowship was a stepping stone, if its holder had anything like the ordinary luck, to a living or livings, or a deanery or Bishopric. At any rate it is clear that a Fellowship was a prize worth a good deal of trouble and intrigue. Probably, as Mr. Godley remarks, if the law forbidding Fellows to marry had not been in existence, Fellowships would have become hereditary. The qualification for candidature for many Fellowships was the place of birth, and this led to some strange developments. "Mr. Elstobb," says Hearne, "when he was of Queen's College appeared a candidate for a Fellowship of All Souls, passing for a South countryman, but, missing this, became a Northern man, and was upon that elected one of Skirlaw's Fellows of University College. The same trick was played by one Dr. Stapleton, who had a Yorkshire scholarship in University College and afterwards a Fellowship of All Souls as born in ye Province of Canterbury. Likewise one Mr. Robert Grey, first a Commoner of Queen's College and afterwards Fellow of All Souls', his Parents and Friends living all in New Castle upon Tine, upon pretence of that he was accidentally dropt in London, obtained a place in Chichele's Foundation." Mr. Godley remarks that though Oxford grew more conscientious about education after the middle of the century, her ideas as to the qualification of candidates and the tenure of Fellowship became less and not more rigorous. And if the preliminaries to obtaining a Fellowship were not exactly a moral education, the enjoyment of the dignity when obtained was very far from being a moral stimulus. The junior Fellow in the eighteenth century had no share in the government of the University. That responsibility was in the hands of a close corporation of the Heads of Houses. There was, indeed, very little for the Fellow to do unless he happened to be a tutor or to pursue research and learning on his own account. In these circumstances the average Fellow settled down to a competence in College with the prospect of a living or a batch of livings in the future. The kind of person he became can be gathered from the contemporary satires which pointed out, for example, that if you wanted to personate a Fellow of Brasenose on the stage you must have a pillow for a stomach; or from Dean Prideaux's remarkable proposal that Fellows of twenty years' standing, who have not qualified themselves for the public service, should be relegated to a kind of almshouse, there to be supported by a pittance from their Colleges. Warton's "Journal of Senior Fellow or Genuine Idler" gives us a hard day's work.

> 10.—After breakfast transcribed half a sermon from Dr. Hickman. N.B.—Never to transcribe any more from Calamy: Mrs. Pilcocks, at my Curacy, having one vol. of that author laying in her parlour window.

> 7.—Returned to my room, made a tiff of warm punch, and to bed before nine.

Nor were the Fellows the only people in Oxford who were lounging through life waiting for something to turn up outside. Behind them were scholars waiting to drop into the Fellows' own shoes. These unhappy men did not dare to leave Oxford, for by so doing they forfeited their chances of election, so that the Fellowship system as it was administered in eighteenth century Oxford kept two bodies of men in a demoralising idleness—the men who were waiting for an opportunity to become Fellows and those who were waiting for the opportunity to cease to be Fellows. Not, of course, that everybody in Oxford was given up to a life of eating, drinking, and sleeping. Mr. James, of Queen's, who has left some severe strictures on his surroundings, contrived to accomplish a good deal amid "the freezing indifference" of that society, and Lempriere began his classical dictionary while an undergraduate at Pembroke.

The chief social significance of the century was its effect in completing the separation of Oxford from the classes which the founders of the colleges had had especially in mind. This Mr. Godley very frankly admits. By the end of the century Oxford had ceased to be in any sense a national University. She had become, in Mr. Godley's language, a close corporation. In some respects the change which came over Oxford reflected the change that was coming over England with the concentration of power in the hands of a small class. Mr. Godley notes the disappearance of the sons of the "old rusty farmers," and the growth of more extravagant habits in the colleges. The revised statutes of 1770 marked the distinctions of rank within the University. Noblemen had worn felt tufts since 1738, and this custom was now made binding. Baronets were given gold tufts and black gowns; gentlemen commoners silk gowns and velvet caps. Servitors were to wear the square cap without the apex. These ridiculous insignia did not disappear until 1870. But the great illustration of the new spirit in Oxford was shown in the expulsion of the six Methodists from St. Edmund Hall in 1768. These young men had been sent to Oxford by the Countess of Huntingdon. One of the tutors of St. Edmund Hall invited the Vice-Chancellor Durell to hold a "visitation" on these six undergraduates accused of Methodism and of certain dangerous opinions, and further, of being low-born persons. The notes of their trial show that it was complained that one of them was brought up to the trade of a weaver, and that he had kept a tap-house, and that another had been brought up to the trade of a barber. Dr. Nowell, the Public Orator, insists that the legal cause of their expulsion was their attendance at illicit conventions, prohibited by the statutes of the University. But, he adds, "a further aggravation of their crime was that they were most of them illiterate mechanics who had intruded themselves into the University, for which they were neither designed nor qualified." Boswell said to Johnson of this event, "Was it not hard to expel them, for I am told they were good beings?" "I believe," replied Johnson, "that they might be good beings, but they were not fit to be in the University of Oxford. A cow is a very good animal in the field, but we turn her out of a garden." When we remember that so late a foundation as Pembroke (Johnson's own college) was endowed in the seventeenth century for the benefit of "pauperes ac indigentes," we can see how far eighteenth century Oxford had travelled from the intentions of the founders of its colleges. The Oxford against which Cobbett thundered, and which Hazlitt could not visit without brooding over the narrow monopolies of which it was the home, had become the close preserve of a class and a sect. At no time in its history was it less of a national institution. And in no institution could be traced quite so clearly the disastrous changes that had impoverished the civilisation and the civic spirit of England.

CAN THERE BE A SCIENCE OF POLITICS?*

In politics, as in business, it is matter of regret that students commonly lack personal experience, and practicians lack scientific interest or capacity. Mr. Graham Wallas has the advantage that he is at once a politician and a political philosopher, and his new book is distinguished alike for its wisdom and its knowledge. It is, to begin with, a treatise on the method of Political Science. Mr. Wallas complains that writers on politics have been ignorant of human nature in politics. They have conceived man as a creature moved by a few simple springs, and proceeding, by a rational method, from premises to conclusions, from a choice of ends to a calculation of means. For this schematic picture Mr. Wallas would substitute the real fact—man as he is beginning to be described by the psychologists and as he has always been known to practical politicians—a creature of irrational impulse, responding without reflection to certain direct stimuli, drawing illogical inferences from erroneous data, passionate, stupid, habitual, anything and everything except a simple and disinterested calculator of the General Good. This curious animal Mr. Wallas knows from long practical experience; and it is one of the most charming qualities of his book that his experience has not discouraged or embittered him. He is profuse of genial anecdotes over which one does not know whether to laugh or cry. And if he has hope for democracy, the most cynical man of the world could not maintain that it is because he is an "idealist." Mr. Wallas has fought many elections, and while fighting them he has observed. Here, for instance, is a description of polling day at a recent election:—

> "At my last contest for the London County Council I had to spend the half-hour before the close of the vote in one of the polling stations of a very poor district. I was watching the proceedings, which in the crush at the end are apt to be rather irregular, and at the same time was thinking of this book. The voters who came in were the results of the 'final rally' of the canvassers on both sides. They entered the room in rapid but irregular succession, as if they were jerked forward by a hurried and inefficient machine. About half of them were women, with broken straw hats, pallid faces, and untidy hair. All were dazed and bewildered, having been snatched away in carriages or motors from the making of match-boxes, or button-holes, or cheap furniture, or from the public-house, or, since it was Saturday evening, from bed. Most of them seemed to be trying, in the unfamiliar surroundings, to be sure of the name for which, as they had been reminded at the door, they were to vote. A few were drunk, and one man, who was apparently a supporter of my own, clung to my neck while he tried to tell me of some vaguely tremendous fact which just eluded his power of speech. I was very anxious to win, and inclined to think that I had won, but my chief feeling was an intense conviction that this could not be accepted as even a decently satisfactory method of creating a government for a city of five million inhabitants, and that nothing short of a conscious and resolute facing of the whole problem of the formation of political opinion would enable us to improve it."

The real political man here vividly depicted must take the place, Mr. Wallas contends, of the imaginary figment of political philosophy. Further, he insists, if there is to be such a thing as political science, quantitative methods must supplement qualitative. It seems doubtful, however, whether this can really be done to any very important extent. It is possible, of course, to estimate the number of persons that will be most useful upon a committee; or the best size for a legislative assembly or a legislative chamber. But such questions, though not unimportant, are among the least important with which political science has to concern itself. And when one comes to consider, for example, such a problem as the land question in Ireland, or the maintenance of the British Empire, the factors that are measurable are negligible in comparison with those that are not. Mr. Wallas, it is true, appears to call any analysis quantitative which takes account of a number of factors at once, and endeavors to balance them one against the other. But it may be suggested that where one weighs and cannot count, one's estimate usually depends upon judgments of value rather than of number. It is easy to say that, since a result is reached, the process of reaching it must be quantitative, but this seems to be a pure assumption. The act of choice, as Professor James has pointed out, is mysterious and unaccountable. We drop the "pros" and "cons" into the magic well of the "subconscious self," and presently there floats up to the surface a decision. What is calculable in human nature is what is least important in it; and a political science that should confine itself to elements that may be quantitatively estimated would exclude from its purview almost everything that matters.

Even, however, if this be disputed, even if it be held that human action is calculable and political science possible, yet such a science would not cover the whole nor the most important part of the field of politics. For politics, whether or no it can be a science, is certainly an art; and whatever science may be possible is subordinate to the art. Mr. Wallas appears fully to recognise this. In his chapter on Political Morality he emphasises the need of creating and propagating true ideals. Progress, he urges, is conditional upon the deliberate adoption and inculcation of new moral and intellectual conceptions—"new ideal entities to which our affections and desires may attach themselves." And this creation, as he sees, must be the work not merely of the intelligence, but of the intelligence informed and illuminated by the imagination. Thus, to take one of his examples, there can never be a right government of London until its citizens feel towards it as Athenians felt towards Athens; and they will not so feel until a poet inspires them. Again, Imperialism, so far as it is a living thing, derives its life from Mr. Rudyard Kipling. A nobler Imperialism is conceivable; but that one at least is real, and real because it is passionate. On the other hand there would be no reality in an empire in which the only tie would be the quantitatively measurable exchange of products. It is this view of politics as the creation and propagation of ideals, which is kept in view in the older, and very likely also in the younger Universities. And Mr. Wallas, with all his geniality, is a little unfair to his Oxford teaching when he describes it as "informal talks on Aristotle, Hobbes, Locke, and Rousseau under the name of the Theory of Politics." It was at Oxford that Mr. Wallas read Plato and Aristotle; and it is precisely those thinkers of whom he never fails to speak with respect. An education in pure political science, as expounded in the first part of this book, could hardly produce anything but accomplished young Machiavellians, convinced that what was once held to be the noble art of politics is really nothing but a series of dodges for duping the electorate. Mr. Wallas, of course, intends nothing of the kind. Nor need there be any antagonism between the study of ends and the study of means. On the contrary, each should gain from the other. And teachers and students of politics will understand all the better their Plato and their Aristotle, their Locke and their Bentham, if they will also assimilate the realistic knowledge which is now beginning to find its way into books.

Mr. Wallas's main purpose, then, is to insist upon realistic study of the political man as a basis for what he hopes may become a political science. He attempts, however, also to apply his method to some of the problems of democratic government. He is fully alive to the defects of that government so far as it has been at present developed. He has observed and assisted in the manipulation of opinion. He has watched the genesis, the progress, and the decline of political shibboleths. He knows the inner mind of the wire-puller and of the candidate. He knows the power of a nick-name like "wastrel," of a phrase like "Chinese slavery." He realises to the full the machinations of the Harmsworth Press. But he does not, for all that, abandon faith in democracy, nor advocate a desperate reaction to forms of government that have shown themselves even more disastrous and inefficient. His hope of improvement is based mainly on the broad contention that men can be improved, or improve themselves. With those who assert that human nature does not change he is in apparent agreement. But while affirming, on grounds which are not fully set forth, that in essence there is no distinction between civilised and primitive man, he insists that environment not only physical, but intellectual and moral, selects the psychical elements that shall be operative in practice. To improve environment, if this view be true, is to improve, if not human nature, yet its manifestation in actual life; and that is all a reformer wants as a basis of action. If it be true, as it appears to be, that men do respond to beneficial changes in their circumstances and to higher appeals to their intelligence and imagination, then much may be hoped from an extension of economic and social equality, and from education in all its range, from the learning of arithmetic to the contact with genius. It is on such factors mainly that Mr. Wallas appears to rely. For some political palliatives, such, for example, as that of proportional representation, he has scant respect; and his discussion of this latter point may be recommended to anyone who desires to understand and appraise his method. On the other hand, he attaches great importance to the proper training and selection of civil servants, urging that this is at least as imperative in local as in central government. In a concluding chapter he discusses different conceptions of Imperialism; and it may be remarked that in these most interesting pages, which it is not possible to summarise here, he is influenced at least as much by his own judgment of values as by any such survey of facts as may claim to be "scientific" in the narrower sense. His contention, perhaps, when all is said and done, may be summed up in the dictum that ideals must be formed in contact with facts, and facts studied in relation to ideals. This bare proposition no one would dispute. The merit of Mr. Wallas's book is that it is an object lesson in the application of the principle he advocates.

OLD AND NEW SPAIN.*

Spain—in splendor, in decay, or again, as to-day, in a reawakening—stamps its impression with an indefinable charm upon all unprejudiced visitors. Here are two records of travel separated in time by less than sixty years, separated in change of human affairs by a gulf almost immeasurable. Mr. Cayley is journeying through the old Spain still asleep amid the picturesque ruin of a dead Empire, living amid dust and ruins upon the memory of the great days done. Mr. Marriott is journeying through a Spain almost feverishly alive, amid new industrial cities, the clang and flare of furnaces, and every evidence of a renewed vitality. Upon both the land sets the spell of her attraction. Both return to the North a little regretful that, amid material dominance and a life of vigorous comfort, there is not mingled amongst our more successful peoples some at least of the elements which ennoble and dignify the common life of this poor and remote land.

Those who were friends of Mr. Cayley, and who now honor the memory of a vivid and original mind, have done well to republish his "Bridle Roads in Spain." The story is of the wandering from Seville, viâ Gibraltar, Malaga and Granada, to Madrid, and finally out by the north, of two travellers who are journeying for pleasure, regardless of time. They speak the language of the country. They dress in fantastic costume, and are taken sometimes for merchants from Madrid, sometimes for smugglers, sometimes for brigands—rarely, if ever, for English gentlemen. The comparison is at once suggested, with Borrow. In many respects this later work does not suffer by the comparison. Here is the same ready acceptance of the incidents of the road, the same zest for adventure, the same cheerful putting aside of the discomforts of such travelling, and all its dangers. Here is also—and this perhaps in a form a little irritating—the same intermingling of fact and fiction. In a preface to the "second edition" the author confesses which of the many incidents here recorded are purely fictitious, which have a basis in fact. Amongst the former is the sensational slaughter of a brigand who was supposed to have assailed the adventurers a little distance from Seville. Mr. Cayley reproaches his readers with not observing "the many points of extreme improbability" which the most casual of them, he thinks, must detect in the story. Certainly the thing itself looks bald and improbable enough, but a wealth of corroborative detail has been lavished upon it. The author is not merely content with the brigand-slaying itself; he introduces later a crowd of his companions, who are inquiring what has become of their lost comrade. Later, again, his lady love, described with exact and picturesque detail, is being painted by the writer, when the dead body of her sweetheart is borne into the city, amid the mourning of the people. Sundry allusions to the encounter occur at later intervals through the narrative. The most stupid of readers can hardly reproach himself if he is driven to accept this incident as offered—an integral part of a narrative claiming veracity. Fortunately, in this second preface a full confession is made of all the incidents which are purely fictitious. They comprehend, it must be confessed, some of the most diverting, and their exclusion leaves a certain blank in the story. Yet much that is diverting and readable remains. The dirt and squalor of the ventas on the road—as full of "living pests" as the interior of Turkey to-day; the kindliness and almost unvarying courtesy of the inhabitants, and the gentlemen of the road; the magic of the ruins of a magnificent past, in crumbling arch or tower; the sense and flavor of the South, of an immemorial and (in essence) unchangeable civilisation, reaching back to beyond the beginnings of history—all these are evident in the story of travel through unfrequented ways. Mr. Cayley attempts few generalisations. He is not at his best when encountering the recognised places of pilgrimage, being disappointed in Seville and the Alhambra, bored by the Escorial, hating Madrid, and scornful of many great churches and pictures. But he can give the impression of an atmosphere—moonlight on the roofs of Tangiers with the cats jumping over the narrow streets; or the sketching of the rock city of Olvera, "a pyramidal group of spires and towers," with fifty or sixty spectators gathered round to witness the performance, and exclaiming, "with wonder and delight, 'There is Juliana's chimney! That is the roof of Pedro's stable!' &c." It is a book of sympathy and enjoyment, recording a life which soon will have altogether vanished from the world.

Mr. Marriott's task is more direct and less ambitious. It is to set down, as in a kind of exact diary, the impressions of a limited tour in Northern Spain. The means of conveyance is the railroad, the route is (for the most part) along the beaten path of commerce or travel. The travellers never venture south of Madrid, and who that has never essayed Andalusia can claim that he has visited Spain? Yet Mr. Marriott, with the cunning of the skilled novelist, knows that almost any record of journey can be made readable if only the narrator will humble himself to register the tiniest incidents which, by most seekers after the picturesque, seem unworthy of description—the furniture of the railway carriages, the quality of the food provided at the stations, the appearance of the passengers who come and go. With such material he is able to build up an exceedingly agreeable testimony to the common life of Spain, a common life which he was prepared to accept without prejudice, at the outset, and at the end to applaud with enthusiasm. The "note" of this experience is struck from the beginning by the confession of a mining engineer in the Madrid express. "I am always glad to get back to the South," he said. "I do not feel well in the North; the people in the North talk about nothing but work." Mr. Marriott shows us the workers of Spain, the hardy Basque peasants, the iron engineers of Bilbao—not the sleepy, contented idlers of Sevilla or Granada. But even amongst these he finds a friendliness, a gaiety, a love of beauty and simple pleasures absent amongst those races which have too fiercely sacrificed to-day for to-morrow, and labor with but little reward in tranquility and innocent enjoyment. "All the people seemed happy," is one experience, "and there were no evidences amongst them of extreme poverty. What impressed us most of all was the general air of brotherhood. I have never been among people who seemed so bound together by the sense of common humanity." The same impression was fixed firmly in the mind of the present writer, in experience of a festa held on the scarred and barren slopes outside Toledo: with the whole population, as one great family party, holding festival with sweetmeats and clear water and the play of children, with that miraculous dream city for background, a festival which put to open shame the muddy merriment of Hampstead Heath or Epping Forest on an English bank holiday. Even in the towns—however smeared by the violence and discontent which is bred of modern industrial life—these travellers found the common people everywhere helpfully courteous, putting themselves out to convenience the travellers, the more wealthy exhibiting the dignity, serenity, and hospitality which is always associated with a nation to whom such things have ever been more essential than material possessions. And outside the towns, here as in all Southern Europe, is a life hard and austere, but filled with an inexplicable charm, the charm of those who know the earth and her seasons, and draw some sustained energies from a communication as yet unsevered with all the ancient magic of her power. Here, as a specimen also of Mr. Marriott's writing, is the experience of a "summer night" in such a remote and hidden centre of enjoyment, labor, and repose:—

> "Dusk had fallen before we reached Algorta: a wonderful violet dusk full of soft odours and the soundless moving of the tamarisk. Behind the mountains which guard the mouth of the river lightning played almost continuously, but without any sound of thunder, and below the golden lamps of Portugalette were doubled in the quiet waters of the bay. We followed winding lanes along the cliff in the direction of a dark headland. Somewhere behind a high wall girls were singing a queer wandering tune. . . . Presently we came to a village of narrow descending streets, rude steps, and little quays, dim lit with angle lamps, filled with the hushing of the sea, the tang of brine, and the scent of hidden gardens. In a courtyard women were seated and children stooped over lighted candles, screening them with their hands, in some celebration which was half a game and half a piece of ritual. The children greeted us in laughing undertones, pressing about us in the dark, affectionately but incuriously, as if we were long expected. They touched us with their little hands, asking to be lifted up, and lisped their flower soft names, Manuela, Asuncion, Dolores, claiming invisible brothers and sisters. . . . It is a memory with the fragile charm, and at the same time the strange reality of a dream, made up of tamarisk, the odour of brine, children's kisses in the dark, and the hands and voices . . . in a place of crooked streets and hidden gardens on the shores of the Bay of Biscay."

It is the welcome record of one who travels "with humility" to learn rather than to teach; who finds in the whole of this fascinating land the impression "as of a people waiting"; a people which even in the high bleak table lands of the interior is "able to win with infinite labor the eternal symbols of life—bread and a little wine."

THE MINER POET.*

It is a touching book, this record of the life and work of Joseph Skipsey, for it springs out of a long and tender friendship, and has been written whilst the author was in a condition of broken health, brought about by prolonged and strenuous public labor, and by a private sorrow alike keen, deep, and irreparable. Dr. Spence Watson could have no hope of writing on this subject a book that would become popular. A book about Joseph Skipsey could be no more popular than his poems have been. There will be a handful of very mature men, veterans of the last century, who will read this volume eagerly, as a real and intimate appreciation of an extraordinary man whom they knew more or less slightly (for he was something of a recluse), who seemed to have many of the qualities of genius, who was, at any rate, deeply interesting, and was the possessor of gifts that were gladly recognised by men of the highest contemporary eminence in literature and in art. But Skipsey's work made no wide appeal. His biographer says of his poems: "They have never taken possession of what I may call the pit life of the district. I do not think that any of them are set to music." However, there were some, we imagine, that were sung to music already existing. These belonged to the poet's more commonplace work; and however inefficient and unsatisfactory his verse could be in other than moments of inspiration, it seldom had the fault of commonplaceness.

Skipsey was fortunate in his friendship with Dr. Spence Watson, who now pays him the tribute of writing his life, not in a mere spirit of laudation, but in a just temper, and from a sufficient distance in point of time to permit of a critical survey. "As a poet I do not think that I have exaggerated him," the biographer remarks. "He is a poet, a true poet; but not a great one, though with him the poetical faculty is real, not a common thing to find." Not a common thing, indeed, Northumberland might lay some claim to Mr. Swinburne; but, leaving him out of account, no poet quite so genuine as Skipsey has made his appearance in that county from a time long before living memory. And yet he will survive in the minds of others who knew him, as in that of Dr. Spence Watson, chiefly as "a man of thought, of intellectual power, of quite marvellous insight, of strong and wide sympathy." He was a grave-minded man, singularly familiar with much of our best literature, with much more poetry in his nature than power of creation or of utterance. He said some things well, others not so well; and a few—oftenest small things—he said finely, and once for all. It is impossible to deny to him the authentic touch of inspiration; but it was occasional and for brief moments. Sir Edward Burne-Jones, another of his faithful friends, said that the circumstances of his life had left him at a disadvantage in the art of writing poetry, for which nothing could make up. For which reason he thought Skipsey must carry about with him the pain of knowing that all he did could only be judged after allowances made, an observation that is not more than partly true, for, undoubtedly, Joseph Skipsey took himself very seriously as a poet, and, as is the case with most of us, his imperfections were not nearly so clear to himself as to his friends.

But who was Joseph Skipsey? it may be asked. The question cannot be unexpected. Many of the much more eminent men of his time are fading out of recollection. They were "Victorians." Skipsey might even be called an early Victorian, for he was born five years before the late Queen came to the throne, the son of a father who was shot dead by a constable, four months after the child's birth, because he intervened, for the sake of peace, in an affray between a body of miners and some special guardians of the peace. It seems particularly worthy of remark that Joseph Skipsey and Thomas Burt were born within a mile and a-half or two miles of each other, the one in 1832 and the other in 1837. One entered the coal pit at seven years of age and the other at ten, Thomas Burt with little schooling and Joseph Skipsey with none at all. And both these remarkable children were put to the same work, which was to sit, mostly in the dark, in utter solitude, and open a door now and then for "tubs" of coal to pass through. Somehow young Skipsey contrived to procure light enough to enable him to learn to read and write, his educational exercises being carried out on the door which he "minded." He never liked work in the mine. In boyhood or manhood it was simply hateful to him, though he became one of the most expert of miners. He has sung of the pride of going down the pit, he can never have felt it himself. It was some other experience that he recorded in the touching lines which end in this way:—

> "May he," many a gossip cried,
> "Be from peril kept."
> Father hid his face and sighed;
> Mother turned and wept.

The supper after a day's work was often enough nettle broth, with a little bread in it; but nettle broth, it should be said, is a pleasant and wholesome thing when it is made as the country people make it. His first serious and serviceable piece of reading, after the Bible, most of which he knew by heart, was "Paradise Lost," which, says Dr. Spence Watson, "was a revelation to him." At seventeen he found the aspect of the world altered by the reading of Shakespeare. Then came Burns, and so on. Of course, he had begun to make verses of his own. In 1859 his first volume was published, and it was of quality sufficiently remarkable to bring him to the notice of some other poets and of men who were able to help him to other employment than that of the pit. It sold, too, and other volumes followed at not very long intervals.

Skipsey was now a married man, and for safety of life and more ease of living he was placed as timekeeper at some engineering works. A little later, no doubt through the good offices of his biographer, he was made sub-librarian at the Newcastle "Lit. and Phil.," and there he made such good use of his opportunities of reading that he was said to give less than a due amount of attention to the supporters of that institution. There was complaint, and hurt feelings drove him back into the coalpit again, where he remained until 1882, when he and his wife were made caretakers at the Armstrong College, Newcastle, then an uncompleted building. Dr. Spence Watson tells how he, Principal Garnett, and the Earl of Carlisle, found him bending beneath the weight of two immense coal-scuttles. "My dear Skipsey, whatever are you doing here?" asked Lord Carlisle. "I saw from that time," says the biographer, "that it was quite impossible to have a College where the scientific men came to see the Principal, and the artistic and literary men came to see the porter." So after a while Joseph Skipsey and his wife were appointed to succeed the Misses Chataway as custodians of the Shakespeare house at Stratford. This was another unfortunate attempt to assist him into independence of the pit. Skipsey was a proud and reserved man, and he had to be showman to all sorts of visitors; he was an honest and discerning man, and he did not believe in the genuineness of the Shakespeare relics. So there was soon another break with circumstance, fortunately not very serious this time, because there had been an increase of the small pension which he received from the Crown.

Joseph Skipsey was a poet, without doubt, as Dr. Spence Watson claims; but he was most of all a striking personality. Even those who were most impressed by his work, like Dante Rossetti, or Burne-Jones, were more impressed by the man himself. He had personal fascination, despite his intense, proud shyness. In appearance he had a not very remote likeness to Tennyson, of which he was aware. He had the gift of eloquent if rather discursive speech, and wide stores of literary knowledge, and great depths of feeling. And so he was welcomed into literary society; and so he made friends who took him about the world—among the fiords of Norway, among the mountains of Cumberland, and elsewhere. He had great powers of enjoyment; but was seldom quite happy. In character he was like his own "Seer":—

> "Too nobly strung of self to brook the mention—
> Too sweetly strung to give another pain—
> Too finely strung for pleasure in contention,
> He seeks within the meed he would obtain."

A NOVEL FOR WOMEN.*

"The Passer-By," in character unusual from the hand of a man, shows much sensitive insight into those emotional shades that were recognised as the women's province till Mr. Henry James and Mr. Howells annexed huge slices of the territory and proclaimed it neutral ground.

The heroine, Mrs. Moore, is the wife of a wealthy American financier, who "gives her generously anything that he would not miss himself." For ten years she and his beautiful Louis Seize house, with its picture gallery, have been "very well set off . . . shining as a symbol of his success in business," the business which is his passion and his pastime, absorbing all his thought, time, and energy. His wife has come to understand that her real self is of no value to him, and that he wants to know nothing of her inner feelings. What he requires of her is that she should be on show always as "a conjugal accessory, a social accessory," and she recognises that she is to him what his pictures are—his property. Her early attempts to get close and stay close to him have been rebuffed. He has told her to be "sensible." "He has his work, the markets, but women never understand." She feels, in fact, that her heart has been dried up by the hurrying emptiness of her life—a whirl of dinners and dances and operas, "with a description of her gown in the papers the next day, that was the height at which she could aim." At this stage, when there seems nothing in her life but weariness, Mrs. Moore meets at a dinner party an Englishman, Mr. Sylvian Lore, attached to the Embassy. She has had a vague premonition that this man will be interesting, she has heard of some romantic episode in his past, and his engaging, quiet, and comprehending manner give her a subtle elation, along with a feeling of having to be on her defence. Lore's conversation implies "a previous state of intimacy for which neither of them was censurably responsible." Lore, who is drawn as a type rather than as an individual, is the kind of man who is always spoiled by women, and cultivates a fresh intimacy wherever he goes. But in America Lore feels that the fine shades of his personality are thrown away on the society women who "would rather choose the admiration of the many than the love of one man." And women in society "did not expect to be made love to. . . . This was the country of cold storage." Lore does not mean to go any way in his intimacy with Mrs. Moore, though she is "immensely attractive," but at the opera one night he runs up against an old friend, Serge Kamensky, a cosmopolitan Russian, and Kamensky's enthusiasm over Mrs. Moore's fascinations arouses in him a strong reflection of his friend's feeling. Kamensky is an idealist and dreamer, and is shy and awkward with women, but he sees into the hearts of others, and Lore is receptive enough to catch his friend's ardor, and reproduce his feelings as his own.

The situation that develops is novel, we think, in fiction, though certainly not in life. Lore woes the woman with counterfeited emotion. The woman seeking to realise in her heart the love that has never been offered in life, is as receptive as new ploughed earth at springtime, and Lore, with his engaging grace and delicate fervor of manner, has brought the new atmosphere for which she yearns. But shallow and hollow, he has nothing real to offer her, nothing but a passing "affair," one of the many which are buried quickly and discreetly directly they threaten to give him trouble or to become serious. The husband, however, has taken a special dislike to Lore, and, on the ground that Lore has the reputation of "running after women," he exerts his authority to make his wife forbid him the house. And this step, which produces open alienation between the two, of course, only adds fuel to her feeling for Lore. Kamensky now turns up, and gets into touch with Mrs. Moore, but she can only see him in the light of "a good, kind friend," who is going to give her the inspiring advice she is sorely in need of. There is considerable subtlety in the scene in which Kamensky receives her delicately veiled confidence, as proof of the "mutual affinity" between them, while in reality she is only seeking to gain from his infectious idealism the strength and courage which she needs to take the final plunge, and leave her husband for Lore's sake. The revelation strikes Kamensky in a lightning flash when, on leaving the house, he encounters Lore on the threshold, entering with a triumphant smile. She has been expecting Lore all the time, while he has been preaching spiritual platitudes to her. Kamensky feels savagely jealous when he realises that he has been smoothing Lore's path, and removing her scruples by telling her that one must follow the strongest instinct in one's heart. And this, in fact, is just what Kamensky's talk has done for her. Thrilled with happiness at the new-found spiritual force within her, she tells Lore that she will claim her freedom from her husband and that she will go with Lore wherever he wants to take her. Lore is thunderstruck. A divorce, an open scandal, a shattered career are the last things he desires. He turns cold with fear. "Why should a love affair break up a home? . . . To let them both slip into such a clumsy blunder is impossible, simply impossible." He makes some hurried excuse, and gets away from the house to gain a breathing space.

The moral problem that the novel poses is, in fact, delicately poised. The three men in reality, at this stage, are equally far from her: the husband because he has so long looked on her as his property, a negligible partner in his actual life, Lore because he would use her merely for his pleasure, Kamensky because he is an idealist, in love with his own sentiments, yet Kamensky is the only man who has divined her spiritual loneliness, who is ready to offer her "a worship that doesn't ask for anything in return," but when he next calls on her he finds that all his ideas, all his feelings are quoted by her as Lore's. And in trying to lay claim to them subtly he appears in the odious light of Lore's disparager and false friend. He can only stammer ridiculous excuses and withdraw.

The change in the situation is developed with a number of quiet, imperceptible touches, that would be lost on a crude taste which occupies itself with material events, and is little interested in the subtle web of shifting relations between men and women. Lore strives to get Mrs. Moore to commit herself, and fails through Kamensky's growing influence on her. She feels herself being drawn to the abyss by Lore, while her conscience and her fears and her doubts of him are struggling in a blind vortex. Her husband, preoccupied with the coming crisis and crash in his Wall Street operations, ostensibly leaves her to herself, though secretly he is watching all her movements. A visit of Kamensky, however, is the instrument which arrests her just as she is on the edge of the precipice. She draws back, and Lore, piqued, to punish her, departs suddenly with the Russian from New York to San Francisco. The letters that she receives from the two men suddenly enlighten her as to Lore; he is simply Kamensky's shadow. Whole phrases of devotion in Kamensky's letter are identical with those Lore has first impressed her with. And when Lore returns a few weeks later to New York, with fresh reiterations of his "passion," she shows him no mercy.

> "Do you want the truth?"
> He felt suddenly very uneasy at the ominous glow of her beauty as she stood there, lissom with the suppleness of a feline ready to spring. But he said, "Yes."
> "Well," she spoke very calmly, with perfectly restrained violence. "What were the first compliments you payed me? You found that my lips were like kisses blossomed into flowers. Where did you get that from? From Kamensky."
> He had turned pale, and made a motion as if to speak.
> "Please don't interrupt. How did you phrase your declaration of your love for me? There is a worship that is complete of itself, that doesn't ask for anything—and then about the loneliness crowning my beauty like a diadem—where did you get those things? From Kamensky. And now can you tell me, please, how it ever came into your mind to grow a beard? From Kamensky, too, I suppose."
> From white he turned crimson to the roots of his hair. It was a ghastly moment which, in a moment of distress, she repented having provoked. She saw him, changed, disfigured, opening and shutting his mouth again and again, but no sound came out of it. His eyes got lustrous, very lustrous, and vacant, like those of a witty fish in a nightmare. Then he took himself off.

The moral atmosphere of the novel is healthy from both society's and the critic's point of view. The underlying problem is—which man has really need of her? And it is in fact her husband, who, when the crash of his fortunes comes, turns to his wife like a sick child. The figure of this man, Fred, is painted with very clever touches; and the little glimpses of smart American Society and its crude vulgarity are most interesting. The artistic weakness of "The Passer-By" which, as we have hinted, is one that is over subtle for the masculine mind, lies in the shades of love talk in which Lore indulges, being too pronounced in flavor for an Englishman to use. Lore, indeed, is scarcely an Englishman. All the characters, however, reveal that the author has insight into the subtle workings of human motive.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

In "The Russian Conquest of the Caucasus" (Longmans, 21s.) Mr. John F. Baddeley has chosen one of the most picturesque scenes and episodes that could be imagined, but for the most part he keeps to purely military and historic narrative. The book, indeed, is in the main a military treatise, and excellent as the work is within those limits, one had looked for something more from such a theme. The author has turned his attention almost entirely to the great mountain district of Daghestan, towards the east of the central range, and, certainly, it was there that the resistance to Russia's advance was most persistent and prolonged. For full half a-century these gallant Mohammedan tribesmen held their own against the worst that Russia could do by arms, and treachery, and massacre. Shamil, who might be called the De Wet of Daghestan, is, of course, the hero of the volume, for he conducted the defence for over twenty years, and his deeds are still sung throughout the Caucasus, though it is fifty years since his final defeat, and nearly forty since his death in Russian exile, far from his mountains. Mr. Baddeley knows the Caucasus well, and has worked from the best Russian and local authorities. But we wish, while he was about it, he had brought the history down to our own times; for the Russian conquest of the Caucasus is not yet complete, and by the blessing of God will never be completed. Turks, Persians, and Russians have flung themselves against that vast mountain barrier in vain, and still the mountain races show a courageous front and own submission to no conqueror. Else, how was it that three years ago the Western Caucasus rejected the Russian power, and though, a year later, the present writer passed through the blackened ruins of their homes, where Russian devastation had laid waste province after province, he found the ancient and highly civilised peoples undaunted still, and unsubdued?

Journalist, stockbroker, barrister, playwright and dramatic manager, Mr. J. Comyns Carr has had a full and varied career, and his volume of reminiscences, "Some Eminent Victorians" (Duckworth, 12s. 6d. net), recalls some famous figures in art and letters during the latter half of the nineteenth century. As a schoolboy he had William Terriss and Mr. Selous, the African hunter and explorer, for companions, and Dr. Birkbeck Hill for master. At the bar he came in contact with Holker, Russell, Herschell, Pope. In later years he knew Rossetti, Watts, Burne-Jones, Millais, and Leighton, and, indeed, his most interesting chapters are those in which he deals with the pre-Raphaelite group. Mr. Carr is enthusiastic about Rossetti, claiming that "in some undefinable and yet indisputable quality of genius . he stands pre-eminent among those who influenced his generation." This is not the current view to-day, but Mr. Carr proclaims himself an "impenitent Victorian." Of Whistler he tells us that, though a delightful host, there were some whose appetites "were not always content with the slender material of those delightful breakfasts over which he so perfectly presided." A foreign painter who was asked if he had seen Whistler lately, replied, "Ah no, not so much. He ask me a leetle while ago to breakfast, and I go. My cab fare two shilling, 'arf-crown. I arrive; very nice. Gold fish in bowl, very pretty. But breakfast—one egg, one toast, no more! My cab fare, two shilling, 'arf-crown. For me no more!" There is an amusing, and not uncharacteristic, story of Lord Randolph Churchill's visit to the theatre at Dublin to see Irving in "Hamlet," which belongs to the category of the legend of "those d——d dots." Lord Randolph, who had to leave the theatre before the play ended, went behind the scenes to Irving's dressing-room, and introduced himself to the actor, and begged him to tell how the play ended. At first Irving thought it a joke, but, convinced by his questioner's intent manner, he gave an outline of the plot. A few days later Lord Randolph saw Irving again, and informed him that in the interval he had read for himself, "not only 'Hamlet,' but two or three other plays by the same author." The volume is illustrated from photographs and pictures by Millais and others, including some playful sketches by Burne-Jones.

The late Mr. Joseph Rodgers' book, "The Scenery of Sherwood Forest, with an Account of some Eminent People once Resident There" (Fisher Unwin, 21s. net), will be welcomed by every lover of forest scenery. Mr. Rodgers took a great delight in the glories of Sherwood Forest, and his descriptions of characteristic bits of scenery, as well as the reproductions from his drawings contained in the volume show how great an enthusiast he was. Unfortunately, he never saw the result of his labors as he died while the work was passing through the press. The famous oaks of Sherwood Forest naturally come in for a great deal of attention, and we are given portraits and brief histories of the noblest of them. The Major Oak, the Simon Foster Oak, the Shambles Oak, the Parliament Oak, and the Pilgrim Oak are all touched upon in Mr. Rodgers's pages. The Pilgrim Oak barely escaped destruction at the hands of the Lord Byron who felled so many trees at Newstead. It was doomed to the axe, but the Nottingham people raised a subscription and purchased the tree, which they afterwards presented to the poet when he came to the estate. Mr. Rodgers has made good use of the historical associations connected with the Forest and pleasant accounts of the families who lived in its neighborhood are interwoven with his descriptions. No book on Sherwood Forest would be complete without Robin Hood, and Mr. Rodgers, in a preliminary essay, examines the traditions concerning the outlaw and his literary history. He believed that Robin Hood was a real person—a view not shared by the writer of the article in the "Dictionary of National Biography"—and inclined to the opinion that he lived in the reign of Edward I. The book is beautifully produced, and is a fine tribute to the glories of Sherwood Forest.

The projectors of "The English Review" are to be heartily congratulated on the success of their first number. Mr. Hardy's ballad "A Sunday Morning Tragedy," is full of grim power and intensity. Mr. Conrad's "Reminiscences" relate the vicissitudes that befell the manuscript of "Almayer's Folly," while that novel was in progress. But the main feature of the review is "Tono-Bungay," a serial by Mr. Wells, which promises to take its place among that author's most illuminating studies of English social life. This first number compares favorably with any of the older magazines, and has the further advantage of presenting its contents in attractive form. We wish the "English Review" a long and prosperous career.

Considering the time of year, the Stock Exchange may be accounted fortunate in having as much business as daily passes through its doors. Some of the markets are quite active, with prices rising and steady investment demand backing the improvement. Nor is speculation by any means dormant. The wild gamble in West Africans has not done much to tempt the public to risk money in such a dangerous direction; but it seems to have had a tonic-effect upon South Africans, and the American market animation continues to maintain a great part of its wonted elasticity, notwithstanding the high prices which many American railroad shares have now attained.

Inter-Bourse Bonds.

Those who claim that finance has no part or lot in politics would quickly be robbed of their illusion were they to follow the fortunes of foreign Government bonds at a time when European politics loomed largely on the board of inter-Bourse dealings. This week has furnished a good example of the keen attention with which international politics are followed not only by members, but by quotations on the Stock Exchange. Each move is carefully discussed in a manner dispassionate, steady, and far-seeing; finance has little patience for the fiery polemics of the debate amongst professional politicians, when foreign affairs come to be reviewed. But the broad mind of general Stock Exchange opinion has made more than a mental note of the trend of affairs arising out of the Balkans trouble. The Triple Alliance is no mere tripping phrase upon the lips when uttered in the Stock Exchange. It stands for something very real indeed, and the straining at its bonds is observed with feelings that express themselves in better prices for foreign Government securities. Always discounting the future, there are men in the Stock Exchange who foresee Germany and Austria being placed in some danger of isolation amongst the Powers. This hints at peace—at the peace of Europe, as a whole. So, notwithstanding the Balkan nigger in the hedge, there is more disposition to work on the side of confidence; more willingness to buy stock, and to advise clients to do the same; more ready recognition of cheap securities. Hence, the rise in European and foreign bonds, initiated by Paris, is accorded a welcome, and a confirmation that it has sound bases for its structure. Consols joined hands in the advance, other gilt-edged securities are bestirring themselves to see whether way of escape is not opening out of the slough of depression recently endured.

Coming Events.

Maybe the shadows cast by the coming events of new issues have received fully as much, if not more, attention than they deserve. It is no use trying to shut one's eyes to the stream of fresh borrowing which, for the moment, is but pent up through one cause or another. The Brazilian valorisation loan, upon which so much intelligent anticipation, of sorts, has centred, will disturb the market no whit, its advent being long since discounted in the quotations for the existing issues. Russia will be a heavy borrower about the third week in January. That, too, is a coming event for which the market has been thoroughly prepared long since. Home borrowing there may also be; municipal and Colonial loans are anticipated by the Consol market, as likely to prove a feature none too pleasant of January, 1909. Besides these, there must be taken into consideration the usual multitude of new issues which hesitate to risk failure by putting in an appearance just before Christmas and the year-end, when holidays and dearer money conspire to render unavailing all save the most tempting propositions. Appeals for charity usurp the place of appeals for capital, and the human desire to make bank-balances look large on New Year's Eve is a formidable corrective to the appetite for the purchase of securities. With the turn of the year, however, money is released in large quantities for circulation and investment; and, since it is demonstrable that plenty of capital awaits profitable employment, it may be fairly supposed that sound new issues will not suffer from lack of means to support them. At the same time, the fear of such coming events has weighed upon quotations in a manner which suggests that the process of discounting has been carried at least quite far enough, and that a moderate measure of optimism for better prices in the New Year is compatible with the outlook presented, for the time being, amongst the investment markets of the Stock Exchange.

Diary of the Week.

On Thursday night, in a speech of great power and animation, Lord Morley announced the scheme of conciliation which he has set up as a counter-weight to the coercive policy of the Indian Government. It follows, with some exceptions, our general anticipation of its purport. It contains no scheme of local and municipal self-government, no educational reform, and no provision for simultaneous examinations for the Civil Service in India and in this country. On the other hand, it greatly betters the Simla scheme in its rejection of the Councils of Notables, and in its setting up of a majority of elective members in the Provincial Legislative Councils. Its scheme of representation is large and, on the whole, bold and generous. It admits native Indians both to the Cabinets and to the Parliaments, if Lord Morley will pardon the phrase, on which the fabric of Indian administration rests.

Thus, it provides for (a) an increase in the numbers of the Legislative Councils, both the Viceroy's and the Provincial Councils. (b) The setting up of a definitely elective element in the Legislative Councils, with a minority in the Viceroy's Council but a majority in the Provincial Councils. The Governor-General's veto on what Lord Morley called "wild-cat" Bills remains. (c) Power on the part of the Councils to move amendments on the Budgets and to divide on them, and to discuss and to come to conclusions on administrative affairs. (d) Power for the Secretary of State to nominate one Indian member to the supreme Indian Cabinet, namely, the Viceroy's Executive Council of six, in addition to the two native members who now sit on the Secretary of State's Council. (e) Enlargement of the Provincial Executive Councils or Cabinets, with power to admit Indian members.

Lord Morley indicated the limitations of his scheme in sharply decisive phrasing. It was not to lead up to the creation of a Parliament. He had no ambition to share even in the "beginning of that operation." Indian procedure could not be dressed up in apparel suited to the English or the Irish case. He also defended the coercive policy of the Indian bureaucracy, including both the Summary Jurisdiction Act and the revival of the deportation ordinance. He could not take out of the hands of the Indian Government any weapons that they had got "in circumstances so uncommon, so obscure, and so impenetrable." But anarchists were few, Orientals were not to be met with force alone—did not the Founder of Christianity come from the East?—and the Press, the schools, and literature must be kept open and free. We could not pass an Explosive Books Act. We had ample military and material strength to preserve our authority in India; but we needed moral strength and Indian support as well.

We profoundly hope that this scheme will succeed. But Lord Macdonnell, one of the ablest of Indian officials, said firmly that its prospects depended on the undoing of the partition of Bengal. And we confess we cannot understand how the "moral force" for which Lord Morley rightly appeals can be secured by the seizure and exile, without trial and without suggestion of specific offence, of the moral leaders of the Indian people. Summary procedure may well be excused. But this is procedure without and against law, used wildly and indiscriminately against reformers and anarchists. Our only consolation is that though it has not been stayed by Lord Morley's speech, it cannot survive his scheme.

We come now to the grave, and to Liberals incomprehensible, proceedings which have taken place in India. On Friday week the Summary Jurisdiction Bill, providing for the rapid trial of political offences before judges alone, and for the proclamation of associations as illegal by the Governor-General, a provision specially aimed at the "Samitis," or organisations of "volunteers," was passed at a single sitting of the Viceroy's Council. In addition to providing themselves with this arm, the British Government have put in force an Act of 1818, of the British East India Company, which was, we believe, first used for the deporting of objectionable Englishmen. Under this Act, nine Nationalist leaders have been seized and deported, we do not know whither, without trial or specification of offences. Great excitement has been caused in Nationalist India by the disclosure of the names of two of these deported persons—Aswini Kumar Dutt and Krishna Kumar Mitra. Both are men, so far as we know, of blameless character, of great personal ascendency in India, and, we believe, of moderate tendencies and influence in politics.

We feel bound in this connection to quote the remarks sent us by Mr. Ratcliffe, the late editor of the Calcutta "Statesman," as to the character of Krishna Kumar Mitra:—

> "From early manhood," says Mr. Ratcliffe, "he has been associated with the Brahmo Somajo, the Theistic Church of which he is an honored minister, and to the service of which he has given years of labor. He has been allied with the Christian missionaries and with reforming bodies of every sort in the furthering of temperance and social purity, the education and liberation of Indian girls and women, the raising of the depressed. For a quarter of a century he has edited the 'Sanjibani,' a vernacular weekly with a large circulation and a broad policy of social reform and constitutional progress, constantly and strongly opposed, as Reuter has acknowledged, to the whole propaganda of violence. After the recent attempt upon the life of Sir Andrew Fraser, Krishna Kumar issued a fervent appeal to his countrymen to employ every possible influence to uproot the evil of terrorism."

What, we wonder, would English opinion say if, during a crisis of unemployment, Mr. Keir Hardie and General Booth were suddenly arrested and exiled, possibly for life, without knowing the crime with which they were charged, or being heard in their own defence?

On Friday week the Prime Minister made at the National Liberal Club his eagerly awaited deliverance on the House of Lords. It proved to be an acceptance in form of the policy of making the House of Lords the "dominating issue," as Mr. Asquith called it, in Liberalism. But while the Prime Minister accepted the fight, he hardly chose the ground, or definitely marshalled his army. He insisted that the Government's record was, on the whole, one of successful achievement. He justly said that abroad it had greatly enhanced British influence, and he praised Sir Edward Grey's great feat in vindicating European law in the Turkish crisis. In South Africa, it had ended Chinese labor, closed the quarrel between British and Boers, and created a new free Dominion under the Crown. At home it had given the people "statutory access to the land," and had established Old Age Pensions. None the less it met to celebrate a failure. The treatment by the Lords of the Licensing Bill, as compared with the handling of Mr. Balfour's Act, was "a call to arms," for it showed that working through the House of Lords, a Conservative leader, defeated at the polls, could always remain in power. This state of things must be "brought to an end," and he invited Liberals to treat the veto of the Lords as an issue which "overshadowed and absorbed" every other.

As to tactics, he could not admit the right of the Lords to dictate the time or occasion of dissolution. It would be humiliating to submit next Session merely "a neutral and colorless programme," and neither could the Session be crowded with contentious proposals. His decision was for "simplification of issues," and "concentration of purpose," with the Budget as a "partial solvent" of the Constitutional difficulty. The speech is very variously interpreted. According to Mr. Lloyd-George, speaking to a gathering of Welshmen, the issue would be raised definitely "in the course of the next few years," and the leader of the Welsh Party is said to have obtained from the Prime Minister a pledge that the Welsh Disestablishment Bill shall again be dressed for slaughter, as if it were Welsh mutton, next year. There are further suggestions that even the Session of 1910 will be a full one. All we can say is that this is ploughing the sands with the ploughshare of self-deception.

The appearance of the Eight Hours Bill for Miners in the House of Lords has caused some rather intricate manœuvring. In the House of Commons it was read for the third time by a majority of 175, with only 89 opponents. They included Mr. Balfour, who, however, took a guarded line, laid down in a very flippant argument. He opposed the Bill largely on the ground that it was irreconcilable with Free Trade. That is to say, it involved pressure upon the Legislature by a special interest, it interfered with production, it sacrificed the consumer to the producer, and it raised the price of a raw material. We deal specifically with this old heresy elsewhere. Mr. Herbert Samuel, in an ingenious, if slightly fallacious, quip, asked if Mr. Balfour's argument was that because the Government opposed protective tariffs they ought also to oppose the Miners' Bill. If that was the case, he who presumably supported a protective tariff was bound to support the Bill.

In the Upper House, Lord Lansdowne took a somewhat different line, practically identical with that which the Lords assumed towards the Trades Disputes Bill. He fixed on the Government the responsibility for any increase in the price of coal, but deprecated a rejection of the Bill on the ground that its defeat would not close the eight hours agitation, that it was inexpedient for the House to reject a humanitarian Bill, and, above all, that the Government having advised Parliament as to the economic results of the Bill, the Lords must leave the responsibility to them. But he foreshadowed two important amendments, one for giving the Home Secretary a dispensing power over certain mines, and the other permanently exempting the two windings from the eight hours' day. If this form be accepted, the Bill will never be an Eight Hours Bill at all. Under Lord Lansdowne's mild pressure the Second Reading was carried, 121 voting for it and 44 against. The Bill passed Committee with the exemption of the "windings," and a delay of six months.

On Thursday the Sultan opened the Turkish Parliament in the same palace at Stambul in which the short-lived Parliament of Midhat, whom he probably murdered, held its sittings thirty years ago. The speech from the throne was made by his secretary, Ali Djeved Bey. It expressed the Sultan's pleasure at the restoration of the Constitution. In the passages dealing with foreign affairs regret was expressed for Bulgaria's deviation from the path of loyalty and Austria's illegal action, though it was anticipated that with the assistance of the friendly Powers these questions would be settled peacefully. Attention was called to Turkey's financial needs and the importance of the Chamber grappling with the Budget. The greatest emphasis was laid upon the necessity for reorganising and strengthening the army and the navy, and an extensive programme of domestic reforms was outlined. In conclusion, the Sultan pledged himself to guard the Constitution jealously; and before leaving he himself addressed a few words to the deputies. The speech from the throne was well received.

The new Turkish Parliament has received the heartiest of greetings from the people of Constantinople and from the Mohammedan communities throughout the world, while many European Parliaments have sent it messages of cordial welcome. The Chamber consists of about 250 elected members, including representatives of every nationality, and the Senate of 39 nominated members of an equally representative character. Of the deputies, 45 are Arabs of various kinds and some 50 Christians, of whom half are Greeks and all the rest, save for a handful of Bulgars, Armenians. The Committee of Union and Progress controls a majority: all its ten candidates were elected for Constantinople, about 60 per cent. of all the Moslem deputies are its nominees, and it is on excellent terms with the Armenian and Jewish members. The definitely or probably reactionary members are a few from Mesopotamia, though there are many mollahs among the deputies who naturally have conservative tendencies. There is not much likelihood of an early crystallisation of parties, for the first session will most probably be taken up with practical business of a kind to afford little scope for sharp divisions of opinion. The Committee appears to view the present Ministry askance, and some of its members took the indefensible course of making a private appeal to the Sultan to replace the veteran and able, and thoroughly honest, Kiamil by Hilmi.

We observe that the Prime Minister has replied to a question of Mr. Arthur Lee asking him whether he intended to modify his earlier statement on the two-Power standard, that he had no such intention, and that the views of the Government had not undergone any change, but that he did propose a further statement. We understand that this has been definitely promised to the powerful body of Liberal members who memorialised him. When it is made we have no doubt whatever that the Prime Minister will affirm the two points on which, we believe, the anxieties of the Liberal Party have been set at rest—first, that the two-Power standard applies only to a "reasonably probable combination" of Powers; and, secondly, that it does not bind us to build against America plus the next strongest Power, plus ten per cent. of their combined strength.

The Hops Bill has been dropped owing to the opposition of Radical members, who regard it as a measure of Protection. We cannot accept this definition, for the report of the Committee on which the Bill was founded rejected the protective remedy, and it only applies to foreign hops the method of packing and marking applied to home-grown hops. The objection to the Bill is, we think, that it is a kind of blend of the Pure Beer Bill and the Merchandise Marks Act. We always thought that the former measure had been overwhelmed by the avalanche of wit and argument which Sir William Harcourt once directed against it. The second measure has had precisely the opposite effect to that which its authors intended. The marking of foreign merchandise has not restricted the supply of foreign goods at which it was aimed. It has rather extended it. The purpose of the Merchandise Marks Act was no doubt protective, but the machinery was not—it was simple ineffective.

A powerful letter, signed by many leaders of thought and work in social reform, has been issued on the subject of boy labor, on which we write elsewhere. It complains of the wide-spread demoralisation of boy life especially through street-trading and unskilled work—attended by abrupt dismissal after a period of time—in public and private service. It blames the Government for contributing to this evil by its treatment of its telegraph boys. It might have added a fresh ground of criticism in the way in which the system of boy clerks is being recklessly extended in the Civil Service, to the great prejudice of the Lower Division Clerks. The writers of the letter decide against a revival of apprenticeship, mainly on the ground that changes in the character of industrial work render it impossible. They propose, instead, compulsory attendance at Continuation Schools up to the age of seventeen—a law which already exists in many German States—with the reduction by law of the working hours of young people under that age, the raising of the age for leaving school, the abolition of the "half-timer," the development of a national system of Children's Employment Committees, and the prohibition of street-selling by children under seventeen. Will not the proprietors of halfpenny newspapers co-operate in stopping the evil, or help the Legislature to stop it?

Mr. Roosevelt, who last week published a letter in which he called the Editor of the New York "Sun" a liar, has this week sent a message to inform Congress that Mr. Pulitzer of the "World" if even worse, and deserves to be prosecuted. The "World" is the paper which first said that the purchase of the French-Panama Canal interest for £8,000,000 was a swindle, by which an American ring, including Mr. Roosevelt's brother-in-law and Mr. Taft's brother, had rifled the pockets of the American people, and the charge has greatly embittered the President. Mr. Roosevelt says that it is nothing but a tissue of libels. He may be right, and righteously indignant; but it is universally admitted that the form his protest takes adds nothing to the dignity of the Presidency. The Presidential election figures show that while the Republican vote was only 36,000 larger than in 1904, the Democratic vote went up nearly 1,400,000. All the other parties did badly. The Socialist vote was only 400,000, actually 1,000 lower than in 1904; the Populists almost disappeared, and the Prohibitionists fell below a quarter of a million; while Mr. Hearst's man raised only 82,000 votes. It is curious that the only Party to show a largely increased vote is the one which is supposed to have been smashed, while movements like Socialism and Prohibition, which are admittedly advancing, have made so poor a show.

The submission to the Duma on Wednesday of a credit of £100,000 for police and prison-warders injured by the revolution provoked a strong debate. The Socialist and Labor deputies pointed out that in the last 11 months there have been 1,691 death sentences and 663 executions, and that the rate of official slaughter was actually increasing after all these months of pacification. Some strong remarks by a Labor member led to a violent attack on the Speaker by the Extreme Right, and M. Homaikoff resigned. The Cadets co-operated in voting the Credit. On the previous Friday the Duma took the plunge in the Agrarian question by passing the first clause in the Government's Agrarian Bill. This clause provides that in communes where there has been no division of the land for the last 24 years individual ownership should be substituted for commercial ownership. Legal sanction is thus given to M. Stolypin's edict of two years ago, and a revolution enacted by the Duma in the conditions of peasant life throughout all the northern and southern provinces. The change will, however, take many years to effect. At the same time as the Duma came to this momentous decision it approved the Bill abolishing the free port of Vladivostok and depriving the Siberian provinces of the advantage of Free Trade.

President Castro landed in France last Thursday, and, after a few days in Paris, proceeded to Berlin to consult a medical specialist. The French Government appears to have treated him not unamiably, despite the fact that he had expelled a French Minister from Venezuela with the scantiest ceremony. The Dutch have seized the occasion of the President's absence to commence reprisals on the Venezuelan coast, where they have captured two gunboats. The rights of Holland's dispute with Venezuela are by no means entirely on one side, for the expelled Dutch Minister was guilty of writing an attack on President Castro, which was published in the newspapers. But whatever the equities of the original dispute, the Dutch Government is now conducting its operations in a manner not to be justified by international law. It has publicly declared that the reprisals are aimed at President Castro, not at the Venezuelan people, and it is obviously trying to provoke a revolution while he is absent. In the United States such a revolution is expected and hoped for, and already there have been riots at Caracas.

The Paris Apaches have become so formidable that a Vigilance Society has been formed, which is organising a private campaign of its own against them. The suburb of Neuilly is the first to be favored, and here a brigade of vigilants on foot, supported by a brigade on bicycles, is to operate at night from January 1st. The first section of Paris will be covered next, and this will have a force of eighty foot patrols and twenty cyclists. The prefect of police manages the recruitment of these private police, who are to be counted as regulars and to be under the control of the regular police officers, although specially paid from private funds. The arrangement strikes one as more than curious, and if, as is said, the private patrols are authorised to carry and use revolvers, it has something of the air of the sanctioning of private war. For a parallel one must go to Barcelona or to Pittsburg, where private detectives enjoy the privilege of engaging in bloody pitched battles with strikers.

The size of the crowd gathered at Queen's Club on Saturday to see the University football match is a sign, we imagine, that Rugby is coming back into favor. The game, which ended in a draw, each side scoring one goal, was finely contested throughout, and though hardly brilliant was at times most exciting. The Cambridge forwards out-played their opponents and gave the Oxford halves few opportunities of making openings for their three-quarters. For this reason the Oxford three-quarters, wonderful players as they were, did not show to advantage, although the movement which ended in Martin's try was a remarkable bit of play. Oxford was on the whole lucky not to be beaten, for the Cambridge forwards did magnificently and dominated the game from start to finish. In the three-quarter line Macleod was the hero of the match, and probably never played a better game.

Politics and Affairs.

SHALL THE "DOMINATING ISSUE" BE DOMINANT?

In all that he said at the National Liberal Club on Friday of last week the Prime Minister spoke the mind of the party. If he had said one word more he would have expressed it yet more faithfully and fully. He recognised fairly and frankly that the veto of the Lords has become the "dominating issue" in politics. He showed that the present state of things is one that cannot continue. He repudiated the suggestion that the Government and the party could sit down to the humdrum work of non-contentious Bills as a confession of "humiliation and impotence." He indicated finance as a weapon of potency and flexibility by which at least a partial solution of some of our difficulties might be sought, and pointed to the Budget as the central work of next Session. In all this his speech was in such close accord with the recommendations that have been urged in these pages that we have nothing to do but repeat and applaud. All that we miss is the final resolve still needed to give force, life, and immediate reality to his proposals. The great gun is loaded and trained and scientifically directed. But the electric spark is still wanting and the shot is not fired. Mr. Asquith takes us to the very brink of the conclusion that the Government will, next Session, introduce a Bill embodying their policy for the suspension of the veto; that they will carry this Bill through the House of Commons contemporaneously with the Budget; that one will follow the other to the Upper House in rapid succession; that if either is rejected an appeal to the country will follow; and that in this appeal the central and dominant issue will be the power of the Lords to frustrate the will of the people. To such a policy every word uttered by Mr. Asquith seems to point, and we cannot suppose him to have had any other policy in his mind. Yet he did not speak the decisive word that would kindle the enthusiasm of his party into a flame, and brace it to such a fighting pitch as it has not reached since the palmiest days of Gladstone.

We confess to a fear that before a fighting policy can be successfully initiated there are people of importance who have to learn what a fighting policy means. There appear to be some very hazy notions upon this point. It seems to be seriously thought that a great challenge can be issued, and the fight delayed for an indefinite period until it suits the challenger to make good his words. Here, for example, is Mr. Lloyd George, of all men, boldly proclaiming that "our interest in the great struggle with the Lords is paramount," and going on to inform us that "IN THE COURSE OF THE NEXT FEW YEARS the issue will be raised definitely." It is proved already, Mr. George seems to say, and will go near to be thought shortly, that the present situation is intolerable. Then sound trumpet and beat drums. Summon all the people to witness. Announce that a decisive encounter is to take place, and when they have all gathered together, when the lists are entered, when the hostile arrays are drawn up, when excitement is at its highest pitch of intensity, proclaim in the boldest tones of defiance that the battle will positively take place "in the course of the next few years." Meanwhile, submit and suffer. Take each repeated blow, and get perfect by practice in the art of eating the leek. The modern St. George will slay the dragon—at a convenient season. Meanwhile, the dragon will rage and ravage at his will, and the knight will go on assuring his admirers of the mighty things which he will do when the time comes.

No one knows better than Mr. Lloyd George that this is not fighting. It is worse. It is not even submitting. It is to threaten without acting. It is to repeat the blunder of two years ago. If the position of the Lords is rightly described as the "dominating issue," we must make up our minds to face the issue, and from the time that this is admitted—and it should have been admitted two years ago—every act of the Government should be directed to dealing with it. But without further powers the present Government cannot deal with it. If they seek to postpone the struggle what are the alternatives? They may continue to send up contentious measures which the Lords would throw out. Mr. Lloyd George, speaking to Welshmen, and dealing with the question which most interests them, of Welsh Disestablishment, admits as much, or rather insists on the fact. He tells them frankly that the Lords would not think of giving such a measure a second reading. But what is the result of going through with a Bill of which the fate is pre-doomed and foreknown? It is merely to waste the time of the House of Commons, and reduce its proceedings to the level of a debating society, while the inevitable end is merely one stroke more in the game to the credit of the unconquered, because unassailed, peers. It is one more discomfiture for the Commons, one more admission of impotence. The alternative is to confine legislative work to non-contentious measures and to Finance. The first of these courses has been justly ruled out by Mr. Asquith, who points out that it is merely to set the seal on the humiliation of the House of Commons, and to acquiesce in the disposing power of the hereditary Chamber. It is also to settle down for two or three years, while great questions remain urging for solution, to fiddling at secondary issues, with which by hypothesis a Unionist administration might deal equally well.

Lastly, it may be urged that at least in Finance a sphere of activity remains. We have all admitted that the next Budget must be in the hands of the present Chancellor, because it is necessary to meet the liabilities incurred by the Old Age Pensions Act, because it is imperative to show that this can be done without infringing the principles of Free Trade finance, and because one part of the Licensing difficulty can be dealt with by taxation. But a Government cannot live by finance alone. It would be an impossible position for a great majority to meet year after year for the discussion of Supply and the passage of the Finance Bill, and for a Liberal Government to do so would be for the party to sink gradually into tacit acquiescence in the new view of the Constitution which the peers have, so far, successfully asserted. Nor do we believe that the measures of social reform for which the country is ripening could be successfully brought within the category either of finance or of non-contentious legislation. The proposed reform of the Poor Law, if conceived on true humanitarian lines, will raise a perfect hornet's nest of controversy. The provision for sickness, invalidity, and unemployment will involve legislation, and, moreover, require time, both for the preparation of opinion and for the financial readjustments which they will demand. They should go hand in hand with other legislation, and not all be rushed through in a lump because the House of Commons has nothing else to do. Finally, the land question, though taxation may make the first approaches, cannot be satisfactorily dealt with except through the medium of bills, which, above all others, the Lords would surely reject.

Thus on every point the avenues to continuous, useful work are closed, while, on the other side, the mere continuance of present conditions plays into the hands of reaction, confirms the Lords in the position which they have adopted, and encourages them to go beyond it. Every year that the conflict is postponed worsens our position in waging it. Yet it cannot be escaped. It is truly called the "dominating issue." As such it must be accepted and faced, and, when faced, the struggle must be entered upon with no paralysing delays

THE CHANCES OF THE OTTOMAN PARLIAMENT.

The meeting of the Ottoman Parliament is an event which finds public opinion still ready to wonder, but with a disciplined and expectant admiration. Miracle it still is, but it keeps its appointed place in a time-table of miracles; it is the natural end to a chapter of good fortune, and luck has been for some months so consistent, that a disaster would to-day startle us more sharply than a triumph. It is as though we had been watching a performance of "Nathan der Weise" on a colossal stage for the past six months, and we positively expect to see rabbis and mollahs and priests in an unending fraternal embrace. Nor is this confident optimism unreasonable. The new régime has run, during the five months that have elapsed since the military revolution broke out in Macedonia, almost every conceivable and calculable risk. It has faced the risk of war, first with Bulgaria and then with Austria, a risk contrived by statesmen who probably intended to wreck the chance of reform amid the chaos of arms. Once, at least, the Sultan attempted to stimulate a counter-revolution by rousing his Pretorian guard. The Kurds did actually embark on a minor civil war, and brought about a rather extensive massacre. The Greeks, ever since the electoral period began, have used every resource of a disciplined community and a responsive Press to damage the new order of things and discredit the Parliament in advance. The Ministry has thrice been remodelled, and it contains even now several members whose record under the old régime was far from creditable. Finally, the Committee in whose hands has lain the real direction of affairs both internal and external, consists of untried men, wholly without diplomatic or official experience, scholars, journalists, soldiers, and doctors, and on them has devolved the real conduct of the most delicate negotiations with expert and probably malevolent European statesmen, and the management at home of the most tremendous and revolutionary experiment in all the annals of Europe. Here, surely, were accumulated every conceivable element of disaster, and all the causes requisite for a catastrophe. The first stage of experiment is over. There has been no failure, still less a disaster. Yet one can hardly exaggerate the difficulties which have been overcome. The election of the first Russian Duma was an achievement. But Russia had been prepared by the experience of a generation in the management of provincial councils and elections, and while the peasants of Russia and Turkey stand on much the same level of civilisation, there is nowhere in Turkey an educated class which can be compared with the Russian "intellectuals." Six months ago the races which met peaceably round the electoral urns were burning each others villages, and murdering each others spies. Yet there has been no fighting, no rioting, and hardly even a disorderly assembly. The Greeks are the only race which complains of unfair treatment.

The first instinct of well-informed Europeans, who knew something of the difficulties in the way of a Turkish Constitution, was to conclude that the leaders and the organisation which have achieved this brilliant success must be possessed of an almost uncanny sagacity. They are certainly men of character and intelligence. But in estimating their achievement it is well to remember that the revolution has not altered the peculiarities of the Turkish character. Now the most interesting fact about the Turks is that for two centuries at least nearly every European who knew them well has been ready to predict their early fall as a governing race. Their entire history has been a succession of buffets and disasters, from which they always have emerged at least alive. They have only once been bankrupt; but have they ever been solvent? They have lived on expedients. and survived, so it seemed at times, merely because they lacked the intelligence to succumb. It is quite a mistake to suppose that it is even so low a quality as astuteness which has saved them. No one who has ever met a typical Hamidian statesman, like Izzet Pasha, would dream of applying to his peculiar sub-human cunning a word so respectable as "astuteness." The central fact about them is that they are a race which can dispense with government. Had Tolstoy known the conditions which prevailed about the year 1904 in European Turkey, he could have drawn from them the most specious illustrations in favor of philosophic anarchism. There was, in any good sense of the word, no government at all. There was, that is to say, no machinery competent to enforce order or honesty. Merchants never dreamed of going to law to enforce contracts, nor countrymen of appealing to the police to assure safety. Yet the immense majority of the crimes which occurred were directly traceable to such government as there was. It was mainly political crime. Of ordinary fraud and robbery there was surprisingly little. Had this government been withdrawn altogether there would have been less crime, rather than more. That was in effect what happened at the revolution. We have seen a letter from a town in the interior which described how the Government buildings were suddenly emptied. The worst officials were driven out; the more prudent fled, and only the official coffee-seller remained to complain of the upheaval, which had destroyed his business. Yet this town, without judges, or prefects, or police, remained tranquil and orderly. We must keep this picture in our minds if we would estimate the exact significance of what the Young Turks have achieved. They have destroyed a Government which was nothing but an incubus and a curse. But, as yet, they have put nothing in its place. The new machinery, such as it is, has bumped along, over obstacles and pitfalls, precisely as the old machinery uesd to do. It has survived, not because it is really more solid than the old, but simply because the spiritual climate of Turkey deals kindly with every species of dilapidation. The Turks endured the old tyranny so long because they are an incredibly inert and passive race. They have survived this brusque and uncompromising revolution for precisely the same reason. No race stands less in need of strong and capable rulers. The Young Turks will succeed if they are even moderately wise, and the less they attempt, the better will they succeed.

In the administrative tasks before them much will depend on their success in choosing capable and honest European advisers. The task in which no foreigner can help them is, however, the management of their discordant subject races, and the control of public opinion among the various strata of the Mohammedan population. In the first of these problems we are inclined to think that the future is likely to go on repeating the conditions which prevail to-day. The races which have before them no separate political future will throw in their lot with the Liberal Turks. The Armenians have already returned to the position which they naturally held before the frenzy of the Hamidian period. Their destiny is to understand the Turks, and to serve them, for the advantage of both, with their talent for business and negotiation. The same thing is true of the Jews, and probably also of the Syrian Christians. These peoples will be permanently amalgamated in the Young Turkish bloc. It is even possible that they may heartily embrace the ideal of the reformers, and cultivate an Ottoman patriotism which will in time obliterate the chauvinism of race, and develop a common culture and a true national spirit. But that the Greeks will ever so far abandon their racial pride as to accept this ideal we rather doubt. They are so numerous and so widely diffused that they will always be able to use their power as a separate group in Parliament; and its close relations with Athens will keep it an alien force. The Bulgarians and Albanians, on the other hand, each of them compact and numerous only in a single region, can have no large future in the common life of the Empire, and their interest will always lie in promoting decentralisation, if not disruption.

Of the opinions of the Moslem delegates it is much too soon to speak. It will be well if half of them are inspired by the aims of the Young Turkish Committee. The members from the far East are said to be consciously reactionary. The remainder are probably country gentlemen, elected because they are "notables," and not at all for their opinions. They will be slow to form party ties, and the first task of the Young Turks will be to educate them. It is not probable that any number of them will desire a return to the old order of things. But they will find themselves confronted by men whom they will hardly recognise as their countrymen, and by ideas which they will fail to understand. Any rash shock to their racial or religious prejudices might convert them into an obstinate and stupid Opposition. What their attitude will be, for example, when they realise that the reformers really propose to open the army to the Christians one does not like to forecast. It will be in dealing with this mass, reinforced, as it may be, by semi-savages from Arabia and Kurdistan, that the real ability of the Young Turkish leaders will be tested. Ahmed Riza Bey, thinker, Positivist, and man of honor, is a singularly sympathetic figure when he talks in French to a European audience about tolerance or peace. But how precisely will he strike a sheikh from the Yemen or a feudal chief from the Kurdish mountains? That, in a sentence, is the new Eastern Question. On the whole, our augury is hopeful. The new era, thanks to the soldiers and the clergy, is firmly established, and it follows that all the Turkish instincts of inertia and acquiescence are therefore enlisted on its side.

THE MINERS' BILL AND FREE TRADE.

We need not be surprised at the formal, but thoroughly insincere, acceptance of the Eight Hours Miners' Bill by the Lords. No one expected that they would find in a Bill backed by the strongest labor organisations in the country a "favorable ground" for conflict with the Commons. It was, therefore, safer for the Peers to convert an eight hours day into eight and a-half by amendment in Committee, the mutilating course which they have adopted, and which, we strongly hope, the Government will not accept. But the chief interest of the Lords' debate lay in the reasons assigned by Lord Lansdowne for his nominal acquiescence in the Bill. The first reason was a reiteration of the constitutional doctrine by which two years ago he defended the adoption of the equally hated Trades Disputes Bill, namely, the existence of a popular mandate. It was inconvenient to resist a measure "constantly pressed for by the coal miners." The Lords must yield to importunity. The second reason was that the Bill had a humanitarian aspect. But the third was that although "serious results" might ensue, they should accept the Bill, "because they felt that his Majesty's Government were ready to assume that responsibility, and to advise Parliament on the strength of it." Now this third reason, if it expresses the considered judgment of Lord Lansdowne, is in effect a concession of the whole claim of the Ministry, viz., that the House of Lords shall exercise a merely advisory function, and shall accept the responsibility of the Government, endorsed by the representative House, for measures sent up for their formal sanction. This is a very different theory of the function of the House of Lords from that which claimed for that House the absolute and indefeasible right of determining whether a particular measure possessed or did not possess the approval of the people. If the Upper House is prepared to concede and consistently to apply this virtual withdrawal of its right of veto upon Acts for which the Government takes responsibility, the pending constitutional crisis may be averted. But have the Lords any such intention? Do they not merely take the first makeshift plea that occurs, because they dare not, in words, defend the deliberate breach of the Constitution which their general attitude towards a Liberal Government involves.

In the debates upon the merits of the Bill a curious sophism was elaborated by Mr. Balfour and Lord Cromer with much confidence and fervor, to the effect that a legal interference with trade that would injure the consumer by raising prices was inconsistent with Free Trade. "Here is an artificial increase of cost forced by the pressure of a single interest upon an industry, which must have the effect of 'taxing' a raw material and raising the price of a necessary of life. Can any clearer contravention of the sacred principles of Free Trade be conceived?" urges the Free Trade leader of our Protectionist Party. It is difficult to suppose that a logician of Mr. Balfour's subtlety was himself deceived by so crude a falsity of syllogistic reasoning as this. "Protection is a legal interference with industry: an Eight Hours Bill is a legal interference with industry: therefore an Eight Hours Bill is Protection." The falsity of this sort of "reasoning" by association was effectively exposed by Mr. Samuel in his crushing rejoinder. Even mid-Victorian Liberalism had come to recognise that it was the business of a civilised State to interfere with the conduct of industry and of particular trades in a score of different ways, that such interference usually proceeded from the pressure of certain aggrieved sections of the people, and that the legal remedies for these grievances sometimes involved an increase of costs of production, with an attendant increase of price.

Every proposition and every implication of Mr. Balfour's argument is false. It is false to say that Free Trade merely concerns itself with the consumer; it is also the best economy of the producer. It is false to represent this measure as the pull of a favored trade upon the public purse. It is the first instalment of a general policy of larger leisure, accorded first to an industry where long hours are most injurious, and where the organised condition of the trade enables the change to be effected with peculiar facility. There is no new principle or policy introduced by such an act; it is merely one step in continuation of the long series of factory and other industrial laws enforcing common rules of safety and humanity upon the organisation of private industry. Protection in one sense, of course, it is, but it differs vitally and essentially from the fiscal impolicy that takes that name, and to use this verbal ambiguity in order to confuse and falsify the issue is a shallow trick of dialectical effrontery. Fiscal "Protection" confers a power upon chosen groups of capitalists and landowners to make unearned rents and profits by reducing the general productivity of industry and by robbing the people thus impoverished of a portion of their reduced earnings. The "protection" represented by an Eight Hours Miners Act secures to a great section of the workers a fund of health and leisure which will react in a score of advantageous ways upon their standard of life and of efficiency as workers and citizens. By applying the instrument of public law to secure a reform which otherwise would have involved repeated conflicts between capital and labor, with all the waste of war, another important step is taken towards the orderly settlement of industrial disputes.

The only valid issue raised by such a proposal has reference, not to the legitimacy of State action, but to the probable cost and its distribution. History has shown that the terrible predictions made by threatened "interests" have been almost invariably falsified by the course of events. If, indeed, the faintest plausibility attached to the impudent assertions of the Coal Consumers' League that this Act would mean a rise of 5s. per ton of coal, it may at once be conceded that such a burden would outweigh the gain to the million miners and their families. But when all the factors of the situation are fairly assessed, there is no reason to suppose that any permanent increase of price will be fastened on the body of consumers. The crude calculations based on counting the mere reduction of hours may be dismissed as mere bluff. If the shorter hours produce the same effect here as in other trades, they will increase the output of labor-power per hour, and if the workers take off fewer days for "play" than now, and improved adjustments of shifts take place, there is no reason to impute any appreciable reduction of output per man. But even if the expenses of producing coal were slightly raised, at any rate during the process of readjustment, we are not at liberty to assume that the poor consumer will pay the whole or the bulk of such a rise.

The discussion of the issue, indeed, has not taken adequate account of the peculiar economic conditions attending to the production and distribution of coal. It is extremely unlikely that either large or small consumers would bear the anticipated burden. Some of it must fall on mining royalties and dues when new leases are made. Again, as Lord Lansdowne pointed out, mine-owning has been of late years a very lucrative business: a good share of any increased cost could, and, we think, would come out of profits. Finally, the difference in price between the six shillings or so that forms the price at the pit's mouth and the retail price to the consumers is so enormous that it is quite evidently swollen by the profits, not of genuine competition, but of combination in wholesale or retail trade. Royalty owners, mine owners, and coal merchants could afford to pay most of any such rise of price as is likely to result. They would probably do so, for it would not be to their interest to attempt to put any further burden on to the consumer, for coal, though in a sense a necessity of life, is susceptible of various sorts of economy in consumption.

THE HOSTAGE.

Most readers of romantic fiction are familiar with the figure of the Noble Hostage. He is a brilliant being held captive by his foes, popularly regarded as his devoted followers. He rides in their triumphal procession, exquisitely attired, treated with studied courtesy, held up to the crowd as the apple of their eye. But by his side rides a horseman with a cocked pistol and a sabre loosened in its sheath, who has orders, at the first sign of revolt, to finish the Illustrious One on the spot. This pathetic figure has, we are afraid, an analogy in our political life, and he, judging by an article in the current "National Review," entitled "Mr. Balfour's Sum in Subtraction," is no other than the accomplished leader of the Conservative, or, perhaps we should say, the Protectionist Party. The writer modestly signs himself "M.P.," shrinking, it may be, from the cynical suggestion that he who unduly praises the great lays himself open to the charge of courting their favor. Mr. Balfour's acknowledgments to his unknown admirer would doubtless be warm if they could be personally conveyed, if only for the stress which he lays on the simplicity and directness of his leader's character, and the confidence which these attributes inspire in the future architect of Protection. Mr. Balfour is told, for example, that "no halting measure, no half-hearted scheme of Tariff Reform, will suffice. Suppleness will not pay." As for "trifling with a plain mandate" (who ever thought of Mr. Balfour as a "trifler"?), it can only "consign the Unionist Party, and all for which the Unionist Party stands, to practical extinction."

Thus encouraged on his adventurous path, Mr. Balfour is further fortified with some plain directions as to the travelling companions whom he had better choose. On this theme "M.P." is not wanting in directness. Mr. Balfour is warned, if he would avoid the "malady of lost power," to dispense, when he becomes Prime Minister for the second time, with some of the "ordinary domestic furniture" of the late Unionist Government. Two articles of common use—in the shape of Lord Londonderry and Mr. Akers Douglas—are at once "dispensed with," in spite of the fact that both these gentlemen are specified as Mr. Balfour's "devoted friends" and servants. Throwing them Mr. Balfour's brother to keep them company, and also "dispensing with" Mr. Arnold Forster on the ground of "health," and Lord Halsbury on that of "age," this Purge of the State warns Mr. Ailwyn Fellowes to fling away the ambition stirred by his "momentary and giddy elevation," and shuts the gate with a clang on the white hairs of Lord Ashbourne. "At last," he tells us, "the door will be closed on Lord Asbourne." Thus far, indeed, "M.P.'s" and Mr. Balfour's task has been simple. A brother is no great matter; a Whip is easily parted with. But there may be friends possessing "fairly respectable qualifications." On these Mr. Balfour is expected to do his duty like a man. For example, there is Lord Midleton, "possessed with a gift of lucid and occasionally effective speech," but having a dark shadow on this shining gift, in the shape of a "most unhappy genius for producing embarrassing situations in Parliament," a "tactlessness" which is "proverbial," and a "mauvaise plaisanterie" which is nothing less than a "bye-word." Candor compels the judgment that such a statesman has done his work in high politics; but there are compensations to a truly public-spirited soul in the "management" of Irish peers and of the finances of the London County Council. A still deeper well of consolation is reserved for Mr. Wyndham. He has declined of late. He has cultivated "a certain artificiality of mind and manner," not to say an "unmeaning verbosity," which, though comparatively useless in politics, may win him a golden retirement in literature. For Lord Derby an even brighter future is revealed. Having unwittingly offended the House of Commons by speeches which were "a happy mixture of blundering and frank admissions," by generally acting as the "enfant terrible of the Treasury Bench," and by other "Bœotian" qualities, he is clearly made for happiness in the less rarified atmosphere of the Court. As for Mr. Walter Long, his case is almost too complicated for words. How balance the gifts and the shortcomings of this remarkable man? Here is a statesman whose speeches are "poor and thin," whose judgment is "alike volatile and infirm," and to whom Cavour and Mazzini may be names as unfamiliar as Taine and De Tocqueville, but who is "beloved of the Market Ordinary and the Agricultural Show." In such a casket, it is evident, lie enshrined qualities essential to Conservative statesmanship, and Mr. Long is therefore encouraged to hope that he may still devote his "considerable ambition and modest abilities to the interests of his party, both in Parliament and the country."

We hope that these counsels will be received by Mr. Balfour in the spirit of affectionate loyalty in which they are tendered. To an outsider they may seem to suggest one or two reflections not visible in the letter of these communications. Why, we may ask, has one genius been taken and another left? Why, for example, is the sun of Mr. Chaplin's intellect still to irradiate Mr. Balfour, when Lord Derby's not less brilliant light is withdrawn? Is Mr. Austen Chamberlain such a pillar of fire, even though Mr. George Wyndham's lively fancy has grown a trifle dim? Has a sudden and universal blight fallen on the intellects of those of Mr. Balfour's colleagues who are not, or were not, "sound" on Tariff Reform, while Protectionist wits only grow sharper with the lapse of time and the approach of office? Well, we think we can guess the reason of these efforts to withdraw one set of friends and colleagues from Mr. Balfour's side and to encompass and surround him, not to say hem him in, with another. With no excessive professions of belief in his sincerity or straightforwardness, the Tariff Reformers have given Mr. Balfour his marching orders. They say to him in effect: "We do not in the least intend that you should play with us the game you played from 1903 to 1906. We will not be fobbed off a second time with a Cabinet of Nobodies. We will have no more delaying sophistries preached to a body of private favorites and tools, not clever enough to counter them, or strong enough to stand up against them in counsel. We mean you to take from the electorate a verdict for Protection, whether you mentally accept it or not, to gather round you men who think as we think, and will take the measures we wish to take for establishing a Protectionist tariff. We are not deceived in you, and we know you well enough to know that, where power lies and is duly manifested and impressed on you, you will swallow your pride and do as you are bid." We know that this is the true relationship of the Tariff Reformers to the man whom they are obliged, against the grain, to select as their leader. It may occur to the average Englishman that there is more than a touch of humiliation, and even a flavor of intellectual dishonor, for the victim of insults like those of the "National Review," and of such weapons as will be directed against Mr. Balfour on the morrow of his return to seeming power. But we are afraid we must add that no statesman of our times has done so much to deserve them.

Life and Letters.

THE IDEA OF BROTHERHOOD.

Workers in every field of social reform are constantly depressed by a certain failing in the spirit of democracy. In the democratic triad little more than lip service is rendered to the idea of brotherhood. Individual liberty, however essential, is a solvent, not a binding force, as the failure of the doctrine of laissez faire to furnish a constructive policy for industry and the modern State has proved. A mechanical application of equality has been even more injurious. The endeavor to represent democracy as an exact harmony of the equal rights of separate personalities has had a paralysing effect. For the heart of man refuses to respond to such a doctrine of equality, while his intellect rejects it. Indeed, there is some danger lest the dominion which biological ideas are asserting over politics should carry us to the opposite extreme of neglecting the common character of humanity by excessive attention to individual, sex, and racial differences. Much of this waste and reaction might have been avoided if the social spirit of the revolutionary movement in modern Europe had been enlightened enough to feel the fraternity which it professed. For thus would it have escaped the sterilising individualism in which the early reforming zeal soon lost itself, and have placed its movement in contact with the great currents of human brotherhood which religion has gathered and conserved through all the ages. The mistake was inevitable, and the Churches were, perhaps, more to blame than the revolutionists for the antagonism that arose, for they refused to recognise the human work which the Christian principle of brotherhood demanded of them. Mazzini was, perhaps, the first fully to comprehend and to deplore the great human tragedy of this severance between the forces of social reform and the Churches, how that it had led the revolutionists to dwell upon rights rather than on duties, on liberty rather than on fraternity.

And yet here, too, to understand is to forgive. The political reformers failed to tap the great moral reservoirs for the same reason that the Churches failed to place them freely at the service of the new democracy. For history teaches the sad lesson that one of the functions of an organised Church has ever been to repress, more than to conserve, the true spirit of fraternity. The causes are manifest. They belong to the very psychology of "institutions," with their over-growth of forms, the priestly profession, and the worldly influences of property. The dilemma is by no means peculiar to Christianity. The human reality of every spiritual religion has been kept alive by the rediscovery of the revolutionary doctrine of the brotherhood of man.

For it is this central motif, underlying the belief in an All-Father, that has driven all the greatest religious reformers to insist upon the practical interpretation of religion in equality of opportunities on earth. It is not that the conception demands equality of property or pay, equality of work, or even equality of voting power. None of these things are essential to the religious conception of fraternity as a basis of democracy. What is essential is that every human grouping, from the tiniest village to the mightiest nation, shall be conceived and felt as a family, bound by that sort of human love which binds a family and requires that equal consideration shall be given to every member, not in virtue of any separate rights or equality of work, but as belonging to the family. This is the great moral contribution which Christianity has struggled to make to the liberative movements of the ages, to the overthrow of slavery in ancient Rome or in modern Angola, to the various risings of agricultural bondsmen in every European country, to the efforts of the proletariat in modern industrial societies to get a modest livelihood.

To reinforce these demands as the plain outcome of the divine and human doctrine of brotherhood has been the significance not, indeed, of the Churches, but of these notable revolts against the "world" inside the Churches, like those associated with St. Francis, John Wesley, or General Booth. A very large part of the ferment which just now is stirring both the Church of England and the chief Nonconformist Churches is due to a new dawning perception that they can only keep alive by such inner reforms as shall enable them to realise the Christian spirit of brotherhood. With pathetic eagerness do speakers at Church Congresses, preachers, and writers express their desire to join heart and hand with modern democracy. Much of their language shows, in its very vagueness, how difficult the task before them is. The great mass of the workers in this, as in other European countries, have no part or interest whatever in the Churches. The ordinary English workman is not an enemy of religion, or even of the Churches. He is simply indifferent; they do not touch him. We are glad to notice that there are not a few ministers of religion who recognise the necessity of descending from fine aspirations for "the amelioration of the condition of the working classes," to confront at closer quarters the sort of action Churches, or their members, must be prepared to take if they really mean to translate the spirit of Christian fraternity into actual democracy. Such a book as that containing the Moorhouse Lectures of Canon Stephen ("Democracy and Character," Williams & Norgate), is a bold and serious endeavour to enforce this duty. Addressing directly an Australian audience, living under fuller conditions of formal democracy than exist here, Canon Stèphen is compelled to admit the same failure of the Church to assume moral leadership in the social movements of the day that is here so manifest. After a really masterly analysis of the nature of the democratic movement, interpreted from the standpoint of Christian brotherhood. he confesses plainly that the Church has shirked its duty. "In the past she has shown herself too timid, too conservative. She has allowed herself, in her government, to become identified with the privileged classes. She has been silent in the face of abuses, unsympathetic in the presence of reforms. She has not been faithful in the preaching of social righteousness. Her leaders have shown a caution which may be called cowardice, and a prudence which hardly differs from worldly expediency."

An outspoken indictment of her past! Are we to conclude that a new change of heart and head will bring forth fruits worthy of repentance? We do not depreciate the deeper spiritual and intellectual forces which are transforming and giving fresh values to many of the older dogmas, and we gladly accept Canon Stephen's assurance that "the study of Greek theology has been one of the main factors in the awaking of the Church to social needs and problems. The Greek Fathers make the Incarnation the central truth of their theology: and the Incarnation involves the consecration and redemption of the social order." But a wide chasm stands open between the intellectual and emotional acceptance of such a social gospel and its translation into a propaganda of effective deed. The real trouble in such a society as ours is that all our powerful stable institutions in Church, as in State, industry, education, and even recreation, are suffused with a traditional spirit of unfraternity, derived ultimately from hard, fixed notions about property, all of which embody a flat denial of fundamental Christianity. It still remains a practical impossibility for the respectable middle-class attendant at the very churches where these enlightened social doctrines are preached to feel towards the corduroyed workman he passes in the street, "This man is my brother," and there arises a grave danger lest the pretence to do this very thing should constitute "the new hypocrisy." Voluntary efforts to generate fraternal sympathy, and to express it by organisation for good works, without changing the whole fabric of class relations, are perhaps the subtlest attempt to avoid the realisation of Christian democracy that can be conceived. The spirit seems good. The works in themselves seem good. But the consequence and the under-motive are a preserving of the very basis of those class relations which are responsible for the degradation of the term designed to express the first of Christian virtues, charity. It is precisely by burying itself in "organisation" that the modern busy Church inhibits itself from contributing to the vital movement of its time. It creates a consecrated Mammom of its own.

If the Church is to spiritualise democracy, its first lack is not sympathy, but understanding. It must learn to comprehend the hard saying in which outspoken workers condense their social criticism: "If the rich want to help the poor, let them get off their backs." Only so far as the Churches of the rich learn to recognise that poverty and riches, together with the vices that they carry, are the concave and the convex of the same fact, will they be able to work effectively towards democracy. Only by assiduous unflinching research into the complicated forms of economic pressure, by which the modern social structure enables the rich to grow rich and the poor to remain poor, will the enthusiasm for social reform be directed into really profitable channels.

THE SUDDEN SPLENDOR.

It was an old assumption of the logicians that man is a reasoning animal, and the faith still holds together, though crumbling. The appeal to reason is still respected, and to call a demand unreasonable closes the pockets of men and nations. Yet it seems as if the true test of personality lay outside reason, and the quality of one who has followed only reason's guide is unproven and unknown both to himself and others.

Everyone was reading the other day of a young woman who sprang from a train after her baby which had fallen out. The baby was unhurt, the woman was killed. Nothing could have been more unreasonable than her act If anything, she had less reason, poor woman! than most mothers to save the child, for she was not married. Her life was of some value to herself. She was a domestic servant going to her parents for a holiday. Doubtless, she enjoyed life as much as most people, and there was not the smallest call for her to throw it away. What good did she hope to do for the baby, who, if it was to die at all, would almost certainly die with the first crash upon the ballast beside the rails? If it was killed, she would be too late; if not, there was no need to jump after it. She had better have stopped the train by pulling the cord. Put the case at its best, and suppose there really was some chance of saving the child's life by the desperate leap; still the sociologist would urge that in the interests of the community a mature young woman with an intelligence cultivated by the church or Board School at considerable expense—a young woman whose food and clothing had cost a good deal of hard-earned money, should never have exposed herself to the uneconomic risk of death on behalf of a pulpy quasi-embryo, whose food had been milk on the cheap, whose clothes were trivial, and whose education had not cost the State a farthing.

Not only individual, but social unreason was here seen at its lowest. Had the action been concerned with anything less than life and death, what exclamations about the stupidity of women and the lower classes we should have heard! "Oh, Susan," her mistress would have cried, "what are you doing? Can't you ever stop to think?" And the professor standing by would have remarked how slowly education penetrates the average intellect, or have consoled himself with Mr. Havelock Ellis's scientific deduction: "Poets have racked their brains to express and account for this mixture of heaven and hell. We see that the key is really a very simple one; both the heaven and hell of women are but aspects of the same physiological affectability." As for the wasteful expenditure of a highly developed existence in exchange—and that a needless exchange!—for an inchoate and hardly conscious congeries of protoplasm, we remember the scene after Nevil Beauchamp had cut short his career just at its highest in rescuing a smudge of a boy:—

> "This is what we have in exchange for Beauchamp!
> "It was not uttered, but it was visible in the blank stare at one another of the two men who loved Beauchamp, after they had examined the insignificant bit of mudbank life remaining in this world in the place of him."

"Why should a dog, a horse, a rat, have life, and thou no breath at all?" said Lear, and it is the question one always asks when a noble life is thrown away; for the equation of existence never works out right. We ask that question even when there is some excuse for the wastefulness of life—some accepted reasonableness in the call of duty or fame or the praise of onlookers. We ask it when the powder bags were laid at the Cashmir Gate of Delhi; or when Mackworth of the Queen's walks up the bullet-swept edge of Wagon Hill with a penny cane in his hand to encourage the terrified men behind and is killed alone; or when the grey-bearded body of De Villiers, commandant of Harrismith, is found leaning over the British sangar at a range of two yards. History is full of such things, and King Lear's question always rises to the mind. The only person to whom it does not occur is the person most nearly concerned. When the policeman in the House of Commons was quietly carrying out the live bomb that shattered him, he did not say to himself, "Why should a dog, a horse, a Member of Parliament, have life, and I no breath at all?"

These actions are beyond reason and calculation, nor does their splendor depend in the least upon success. When Rome's greatest treasure flung himself full-armed into the abyss, he did not know for certain that the earthquake chasm would close above his head as a most fitting burial. When Katherine Douglas became Kate Barlass, she did not know whether her arm shattered in the bolt would save the King; nor did it. When Alice, the Southwark nursemaid, carried the children one by one from the fire, she did not know till she died at which child she should die. The miner whose story came from British Columbia this week, knew it was useless for him to stay with his comrades when the roof fell, but he stayed to die. Some years ago, in one week at Leicester a porter, springing in front of an express to save a baby, was cut to pieces, and a woman was seen carried down the flooded river holding her child with both arms high and dry above her head. In one case the child was saved, in the other the mother was found with her arms still outstretched, but the child's body was miles away, among the reeds. There is no calculation, no possibility of estimate in these things. They are outside the domain of reason and the principles of economics. Successful or unsuccessful, they all rank the same, or if there is any difference, those that can be attributed to the recognised dictates of duty and good conduct, like the soldier's or the policeman's, are esteemed a little lower than the rest.

Does it not seem as though reason had very little to do with the glory of personality? The quick crisis, allowing no second for thought, tests the whole nature to its fibres. It comes suddenly as a shell that scatters the limbs of men before they know there is danger. In a flash the moment arrives and is gone, but by the flash the recesses of the soul are displayed. It is written that the woman who hesitates is lost, but the word is equally true of the man. To hesitate is in itself to be lost, for the moment never comes again, and by that hesitation all the man's commonplace qualities are exposed as in a gallery of stupid idols. But regardless of thought and chance and time, to leap hot-blooded into deed—that sheds a sudden splendor, rejoicing mankind as they grope their way among the visible darkness of systems and philosophies. For the quick illumination reveals a nature that repays the groaning and travailing of creation's pangs, and when Sarah Jane Wood, on her way to Shrewsbury, jumped from a train in the utterly useless and unreasoning attempt to save a baby, her crazy action proves that her spirit was loveable and fine throughout. It was the only kind of spirit that makes man worth the trouble he has caused.

But if we give an honor surpassing all other praise to such deeds as hers, why do we so calmly condemn a man or woman who, in the moment of burning crisis, falls short of her heroism? If we reward these things with exceptional glory, we should surely be lenient to the ordinary behaviour which we may assume would be our own. But we are not lenient. We are savage in our rage and vengeance. Loukeria drove in the sledge between the Russian pines, her children warm against her breast. The padding wolves followed close, and one by one she let her children drop. In reason there was nothing else to do; better that one life be saved than that brood and mother and all be lost together. We must assume that we should have done as she did, for with what divine honor her fame would have been celebrated if she had tucked the babies under the rug and flung herself to the wolves, no matter how vainly! We recognise her action as something beyond ourselves, sometimes almost superhuman. Yet the average man stands quietly by while Ivan Ivanovitch swings his axe and off flies her head, amid general approval. "It had to be: I could no other: God it was bade 'Act for me!'" he says, as he wipes the axe on a bit of bark, and we regard his claim to be God's executioner as quite justified, though it is our own necks that he really severs.

Those who stand so quietly by and exclaim, "Quite right, Ivan! you're the proper sort of man!" have never known what fear is. They have never faced that moment of extremity when fear saps the life-blood, and the throat is dry, and the tongue cleaves to the roof of the mouth, and life is so dear, and the horror of annihilation has come within a stride. Till he has faced that moment, let no man breathe a condemnation, or act God's headsman. For no man knows what he may do when the heart fails for very terror, and the secrets of the soul are revealed. Of all the virtues, there is none so treacherous as courage, none so uncertain a possession. Yet we have no mercy on the man or woman whom it fails. Is there then no mean between divine honors for the brave, and that swinging axe for the average mortal? Man is not a reasoning animal, and, to his eternal credit, there is no mean. But the Ivans among us might remember that, if things came to the supreme test, it is the axe that nearly all of us would deserve.

THE HARVEST OF WATERLOO.

Chateaubriand, listening at the gate of Gand to the cannonade of Waterloo, has described himself as torn by conflicting feelings, passionately resenting the defeat of his country, while recognising that her victory meant for him a life-long exile. And the observer to-day, listening across the noise of generations to that same memorable thunder, is also oppressed by conflicting verdicts. On the one side is rejoicing in the national triumph, the removal from British shores of a spectre which had kept men awake at nights—the consummation of the beginnings of Trafalgar. And with that also is a certain vindication of national rights violated, more especially in Spain, by a relentless Imperialism. But the balance sinks heavily to the other side when one realises that this adventure of a June day meant the return of the Bourbons and the dolorous retinue they brought in their train, the triumph of the old Kings, Austria and the Papal power dominant in Italy, the crushing—as it seemed then for ever—of every generous hope of Freedom and the comfort of the common people which had been born, in fire and blood, in the Revolution. If ever men could have been justified in despair of the future, contemplating the fantastic drama of human history, it would have been during the decade succeeding the fall of Napoleon, with England in the squalid farce of the later Regency, Peterloo massacres, and the famine riots of the rural laborer, the Holy Alliance and Lord Eldon weighing heavily on the world. The fact that hope and resistance could struggle through that time, forward to the raising again of the banner "torn and flying" in 1830, to the great Reform Bill, to the larger enthusiasms of '48, is a fact that guaranteed far more than all its sensational earlier successes, the reality of this New Thing that had been born into the world.

There were a very few in England, and curiously enough, some soldiers, who had passed from the approval of the earlier Revolution as "d—d Whigs," into a recognition of the necessity for the Napoleonic devastations in order that this earlier Revolution should overthrow the stagnant and dusty dominance of Governments fast hastening to decay. The journal of such an one, long hidden in obscurity, has just been published, a document of remarkable interest, as revealing the experience of an eye witness to this triumph of the reaction. In "After Waterloo" (Heinemann) Major Frye, once of the third Ceylon Regiment, at the time of his journal in Europe on half-pay in the third Foot, makes his first appearance as an author, after an interval of nearly a hundred years. He had seen much service in the long wars, had fought against the French in Holland and Egypt, against other foes in many expeditions in the Indies. He had returned from the East three months before Napoleon escaped from Elba. On realising that fighting was again begun, he planned an expedition with a former Ceylon governor, to the scene of war. Like Chateaubriand, he heard the cannonade of Waterloo, and visited the battle-field four days afterwards in all its horrors, with multitudes of corpses still unburied, and "heaps of wounded men, with mangled limbs, unable to move, and perishing from not having their wounds dressed, and from hunger." Thence he journeyed for many months, up the Rhine, to Paris, in Italy, for the most part for the pleasure of scenery and picturesque places, everywhere noting the attitude and temper of the people. It is the testimony of things seen, not without prejudice, on the side of Freedom and against the Government of his own country, but with much in that testimony which bears the mark of truth.

He found a Europe fatigued, but by no means satisfied. If the Empire was bad, the rule of the motley and inglorious crew that succeeded it was very much worse. In Belgium he found the inhabitants angry at being separated from France, and almost entirely on the side of Napoleon. At Gand he discovered the Bourbon Court, which had so ingloriously fled behind the shelter of the British guns without a shot for its defence or a tear for its departure. "Monsieur has all the appearance of a worn-out debauchee," is the unflattering description; "and to see him with a missal in his hand, and the strange contrite face he assumes, is truly ridiculous. These princes, instigated no doubt by the priests, make a great parade of their sanctity, for which, however, those who are acquainted with their character will not give them much credit." At Aix-la-Chapelle he finds Napoleon's memory venerated, the Prussians hated, the "common exclamation": "De nostris liberatoribus, Domine, libera nos." At the French capital, "Louis XVIII. has been hustled into Paris," he drily records, "and now occupies the throne of his ancestors under the protection of a million bayonets." While the pleasures of the occupying soldiery are being bountifully provided at the Palais Royal and elsewhere, while the Allies have parades and reviews two or three times a week, "with the Sovereigns of Russia, Austria and Prussia in constant attendance, and Wellington as their showman," this honest man will weep for freedom slain, and now buried and stamped down in hope that she will never rise again. "France is at the mercy of her enemies, and prostrate at their feet: a melancholy prospect for European liberty." The more he sees what has returned—the apparatus of the Kings who had never learnt either to remember or to forget—the more he is disgusted by the vision. Two months after Waterloo he can write of it—"I have seen and can see no reason whatever to rejoice at this event. I fear it is pregnant with infinite mischief." In Italy, at Milan, in Bologna, everywhere outside Tuscany, he found the rule of Napoleon regretted, the Austrian abhorred. In France, the emigrants demand the obliteration of the very memory of the Revolution. All the glory of the great victories is to be forgotten, because it was acquired by a people which had repudiated its legitimate sovereign: "Il faudrait, pour le bonheur de la France," is the cry, "qu'elle fût placée dans le même état où elle etait avant la Révolution." "The priests are at work everywhere," is a later complaint; "trumping up old legends, forging communications from the Holy Ghost, receiving letters dropped from Heaven by Jesus Christ; and all this is done with the idea of working on fanatical minds, to induce them to commit acts of outrage and violence on those whom the priests designate as enemies to the faith, and on weak ones." It is the Blessed Restoration in England, but with a profound difference, for the return of Charles II. received probably the most popular and universal welcome of any Governmental change in history. The return of Louis XVIII. was the establishment, through menace of foreign bayonets and a great internal weariness of a ruler repudiated by almost the whole nation. Major Frye will not listen to the story that Napoleon's triumph after Elba was merely the work of the soldiers. He stays in Châlons, at the "Hotel du Parc," the hostess of which entertained the Emperor on his way from Lyons to Paris in that return: "She said that such was the empressement on the part of the inhabitants to see him, and embrace him by way of testifying their affection, that the Emperor was obliged to say, 'Mais vous m'étouffez, mes enfants.' In fact, had the Army remained neutral, the peasantry alone would have carried the Emperor on their shoulders to Paris." "In their conduct on this occasion," is the conclusion of this vigorous critic, "the French soldiers proved themselves far more constitutional than those of any other army in Europe, let despots, priests, and weak-headed Tories say what they please to the contrary."

So, after having "walked by conflagrations and in the light of burning cities," Europe settled down to the sleep of exhaustion—a sleep of death. It is a vision of profound silence and slumber, untroubled by any sound or vision of the dawn. England, raised by the success of the obstinate policy of subsidies and the crowning service of Waterloo to a position of high prestige, was working out the consequence of that policy of subsidies in staggering taxes upon food and a poverty hitherto unparalleled. The effort of Reform expired like a guttering candle; the education of the aristocracy was bearing fruit. "The system at Eton," is Major Frye's recollection, "was to drill into the heads of the boys strong aristocratic principles and hatred of the democracy, and of the French in particular. We were ordered to write themes against the French Revolution and verses of triumphs over their defeats, with now and then a sly theme on the great advantage of hereditary nobility. In these verses God Almighty was to be represented as closely allied to the British Government and a sleeping partner of the Administration." The lecturer on natural and experimental philosophy was informed "that his visits were no longer agreeable and would be dispensed with in future, as 'Philosophy had done a great deal of harm and had caused the French Revolution.'" To the general, the discipline was extraordinarily efficacious. There were some who rebelled; one, notably, who passed from illicit experiments in "natural and experimental philosophy" to doubt of the existence of the "sleeping partner in the Administration," and thence to the impeachment of all that dignified maintenance of law and order as a veritable "Masque of Anarchy," revelling heedless of the cries of the last maniac child of Time:—

> "My father, Time, is weak and grey
> With waiting for a better day;
> See how idiot-like he stands,
> Fumbling with his palsied hands.
> "He has had child after child,
> And the dust of death is piled
> Over every one but me—
> Misery! oh, Misery!"

Only such a visionary could see behind the people "starved and stabbed in the untilled field," ruled by "an old mad, blind, despised, and dying king," and "princes the dregs of their dulled race," the figure of a "glorious phantom" which would one day burst the prison of its grave. And Shelley himself could not foresee that already walking the earth—a student who went always in black in the streets of Genoa in mourning for his country, a fisherman's child at Nice with the sea-passion already on him, a boy who was shortly to enter that very Eton which inoculated the traditions of the oligarchy were such fighters in "the warfare of humanity" as were destined to "illuminate our tempestuous day."

IN THE RAIN.

Silent, invisible, unromantic, but most drenching drizzle. It comes from the unmoving pall of a white mist that may be piled to the top of our atmosphere or may be only a few yards thick between us and the sun—a question of much moment to those who believe that such a day of all-pervading damp is one of the days that cannot be spent in the open. It only presents us with the trifling problem, whether or no to take a cape or mackintosh to cover the shoulders. And whether the optimistic belief that the cloth of descending moisture is getting threadbare is sound or not, the mackintosh is a good thought in view of the fact that we expect to walk under dripping trees. Every branch holds a shower-bath booby-trap waiting for him who unwittingly touches the spring. The birch trees hold their diamonds best, every twig of that drooping, fountain-like growth having its pendulous globule. No water comes down those silvery or deeply scored trunks. Every drop that falls on an outer branch flows not inward but outward, not from tributary to river, but, so it seems, from river to rivulet, thence to the tiny indivisible twig, to pause and twinkle, as though hesitating to take the long drop to the ground.

Down the vivid green trunks of the beech, on the other hand, dash veritable torrents, that have accumulated from the labyrinth of boughs, the topmost of which are quite lost in the mist. Their trunks are marked by black streaks in the green, black as night till the carefully focussed eye sees in them the white threads of hurrying waves. Some of the would-be tributaries lose their way in the lower reaches, just missing junction with the main stem by reason of some awkward kink that sends them to the lower side of the bough. So they drip in a white cascade from the elbows of the tree, drilling miniature pocket-holes through the loam to the gravel, and churning their contents to a white froth. Below these dripping elbows are the only dry stretches, running into deep and cosy arm-pits, where the delicately over-winged winter moth, or his fat, wingless spouse, may hang in safety and wait for better flying weather. The deeply corrugated oaks offer more frequent, though more risky, havens, as testify the torn wings of the male fluttering from the drenched web of the spider.

Kicking very deeply in the beech leaves, we can see how the rain has added many tones to their red. The dry leaves that come up are pallid, half-painted things by comparison. The bracken which yesterday matched without fault the big red stag, to-day reveals him like a lemon on orange, for if somehow he has not managed to keep dry—his hair does not soak up water like the dead vegetation. The bad weather has soured his temper. Instead of throwing out his maned chest, tossing his head, and pawing the ground to intimate that he will not have his hinds disturbed, he turns his back on the human intruder, and sulkily bullies his wives from the ditch under the fence where they have made some kind of shelter from the falling rain. He does not take their place, but just compels them to stand out there and be thoroughly miserable with their lord and master. As we turn from this picture of four-footed human nature, a wood mouse slips from the open, back into the shelter of a hawthorn. He, too, has all the color of dryness as he passes across the sodden leaves and negotiates the jewelled bush without bringing down a particle of rain. A blackbird passes by with that whistling flirt that thick weather produces from his usually silent wings, and a few birds, known as jackdaws by their voices, though lost to sight in the mist, make a noise with their wings not unlike sawing. Further off, the carrion crow hoarsely laments the days when there were plenty of eggs to be sought and eaten, and from almost under our feet flies a speck of avine anatomy that seems too busy to notice that the day is a wet one. It is a gold-crested wren, and in the next bush we have it at arm's length, as it hangs and reaches this way and that, unmindful of the danger of bringing down a torrent of drops that would surely overwhelm it.

Many of the rabbit holes are wetted through, if not flooded out owing to a defective arrangement of the main entrance or the bolt-hole. Our dog puts their owners out from the bushes, and even finds them in spare, hare-like forms on the open bank, where some of them seem to prefer the regular drizzle to the annoying, unexpected splashing from the twigs. With all its drenching, the bank is dryer under foot than the dead leaves at the bottom of the hedge-row. We find that some of the bunnies that were sitting in the open rain had chosen stones to sit on, and these are dry and warm as toast immediately after their occupants have scuttled reluctantly to cover.

At three in the afternoon the rain ceases, and some sort of sun-glow struggles for a few moments through the mist. It is too late in the day for sunshine however. We get a transient taste of what a full light could do with the damp-heightened color of bracken and beech leaves, and then a whiter mist than we have had yet, the mist of evening, rolls apparently from its hiding-place in the bushes and takes imperceptible possession of the fields and open glades. It softens and glazes the tree-trunks into a sort of charcoal grey, then slips behind them and shuts out all the beyond with such a veil of pearl that they come by contrast blacker than ever. It hangs the drooping bracken fronds with a pearling that trembles on the verge of hoar-frost, which, by morning, it will surely be. It weaves in and out of the bare branches, till it decorates them with a ghostly imitation of their summer foliage, and it makes the red deer loom like gigantic moose, and the jackdaws like eagles.

A thousand wood pigeons are going to roost in this wood. As we pass, company after company leaves its session with a roar like that of an express train. Not as Virgil has it, subito commota columba . . . plausumque . . . ingentem. Our doves can clatter like this when the air is clear, but the buffers of the fog reduce their sharpest clamor to a roar. We overtake them again and again, for they flee from us in the line of our advance, and do not care to go far, as though fearful of losing the favorite part of the wood altogether, in the mist and gathering dusk. So we drive them by platoons till, with one great roll of thunder, the whole army at length rises and makes back on both flanks to the place from which they were originally disturbed. The starlings that roost in the hazel rods, we imagine, have not performed this evening their bedtime evolutions. As we pass through the midst of their dormitory, an occasional whistle proclaims the fact that they have not yet quite sunk to sleep. Yet it is well past four, and only owing to the superior refractive power of a damp evening can we see to the south a staining of our woolly nightcap that proclaims that there the sun has set in a splendor that only those that soar above the mist can see.

Present-Day Problems.

THE CHILD TRADER.

Complexity and immensity are the deterrent features of most social problems. Every reformer desires to find a remedy for unemployment, to prevent drunkenness, to abolish pauperism, but the social doctors prescribe inconsistent antidotes for these diseases, and each asserts that the other's medicines will only aggravate the complaint. Every now and then, however, in social as well as in physical pathology, one comes upon some isolated local disorder which a simple operation would completely cure, and one is lost in wonder why the patient has endured suffering for years which the exercise of a little common sense would have removed.

The case of street-trading children is an example of this class of social disease. That it is a disease seems almost too obvious to require proof. No thinking person, passing through the main streets of London and every other big town, hurrying to his railway station in the rain and mud of a bleak winter evening, can bear to consider the present life and the future prospects of the small wizen-faced boys who press him to buy an evening paper or the ragged little girls who offer boxes of matches.

The philosophic doubter who weighs the social consequences of his smallest act may debate within himself whether it is better to refuse encouragement to the street-trader, and to purchase his paper or his matches at the railway station; or, on the other hand, whether his copper is not well bestowed in adding a tiny fraction to the earnings of a hungry child, instead of a tinier item to the profits of a millionaire bookstall proprietor.

Anxious to be spared this perplexity, the modern philanthropist, in face of a social evil obviously susceptible of remedy, consults neither the Church nor the Charity Organisation Society, but his solicitor. What, he enquires, has the law to say about street-trading children? And then he makes a quite astonishing discovery, namely, that the Government of the British Empire, in the third year of the twentieth century, actually passed an Act of Parliament to license little boys and girls of eleven years of age to carry on trade in the streets of our big towns up to nine o'clock at night, in winter as well as summer, and even later if a local authority permits it. It seems incredible, but it is a fact. The six hundred and seventy members of the House of Commons, not to speak of the five hundred and ninety-three peers, prompted by scores of Home Office officials, every one of whom would regard with disapproval the nurse or governess who allowed his own children of eleven to sit up round a cosy fire till nine o'clock for two evenings running, solemnly enact that the children of the poor may not trade in the streets under the age of eleven, or (unless the local authority permits) after the hour of nine, and thus authorises such trading after that age and up to that hour. And only a few lines lower down the Act has the impudence—no weaker word will serve—to provide that "A child shall not be employed in any occupation likely to be injurious to his life, limb, health, or education, regard being had to his physical condition"! This is not an example of the little things for which the law does not care. The law has cared, only five years ago, and now the little ragamuffins of our street are traders licensed by Act of Parliament!

The results of this licensed street-trading are deplorable, and that by universal admission. Chief Constables are not exactly sentimentalists, and their opinions on such a question should carry weight. The Chief Constable of Manchester, in a paper read at the Mansion House last May, said that "Street-trading, of all juvenile wage-earning occupations, is productive of a greater amount of evil, morally and physically, than any other occupation followed by children." The boys become "for the most part race-course touts, often travelling thieves and loafers, and as such spend their lives in common lodging-houses . . . .till they end their days in the gaol or the workhouse." The girls as a general rule become prostitutes.

But even if these children do not become criminals, it is clear that they cannot grow up into useful citizens. "They dislike more and more honest work," to quote the Chief Constable again. They are growing into material for the Distress Committees, candidates for Farm Colonies, members of that hopeless class on which Royal Commissions deliberate for years at a stretch. Why is "this hot-bed of vice and crime," as one authority calls it, licensed by the Act of 1903 to rear a crop of criminals, prostitutes, and loafers, for our Charity Organisation Societies and Howard Associations, our Refuges and Reformatories and Rescue Societies to garner.

Apparently the only answer is that the old legal maxim that anything in restraint of trade is unlawful still dominates our statesmen.

No doubt defenders of official inaction will trot out the unfortunate widows, the out-of-work fathers, who are the obstacles to all social reform.

Investigation, of course, demonstrates that the widowhood and the unemployment are imaginary. The respectable widow does not allow her boys to trade in the street; the father of the gutter ragamuffin is not an unemployed artisan but an unemployable, or, perhaps, a skilled craftsman at a trade known chiefly to the police. We do not assert that there are no cases of street-trading children whose parents are poor but respectable. It is certain, however, that they are but a minute fraction of the whole and that the earnings of the great majority of these children are handed over to drunken fathers and dissolute mothers, except when the children are living as well as trading on their own account.

Here, then, are seventeen thousand six hundred and seventeen street-hawking children counted in the Return of Children Working for Wages in 1898, and probably some twenty-five thousand children, according to the official estimate, who are to be licensed to a criminal-producing occupation, because of some old-fashioned notion that parents must be allowed freedom to mar their children's lives (which the community will later vainly seek to mend), or that the children themselves must be left free to do the best for themselves although all grown-up people are aware that in fact they are doing the worst.

As for the remedy, that is so simple and so easy that it seems incredible that Parliament can decline to adopt it.

Street-trading is no great vested interest that any party need fear to attack, though, indeed, a charge of want of this courage could not plausibly be brought against the present Ministry. Street-traders have no votes, and even the daily Press, which is a partaker in the crime, and, therefore, does not freely denounce it, would not attempt to defend its own shortcomings.

Street-trading is now—in most towns—a licensed profession necessarily carried on with complete publicity. It is as easy to forbid as to license. Already the local authorities may make by-laws for street-traders under the age of sixteen. At the date of the last return in June, 1907, only one county, besides London, only four urban districts, and sixty-seven boroughs had exercised this right. The law already prohibits street-trading by children under the age of eleven. A line in the Children's Bill would raise that age to fourteen. Already a local authority may prohibit girls under sixteen from street-trading. That "may" could by a phrase be turned into "must."

Why, then, does the Government object? Mr. Gladstone, in answer to a question in the House, replied that the employment of children involved numerous and controversial questions. It would have been equally relevant to refer to the procession of the equinoxes. The employment of children is a complicated matter, but the street-trading by children on their own account is no part of this problem. Mr. Herbert Samuel regretted he must omit the subject as contentious. Does he refer to Mr. Harold Cox? Surely no one else could advocate free trade in the production of criminals! The local authorities are not known to be unfavorable. The Corporation of Glasgow has indeed already approved the proposal.

The Children's Bill contains pages of carefully devised clauses for the regulation of child criminals. Surely it is worth while to add another clause which will put an end to a system which makes children into criminals.

Short Study.

In the "Reminiscences" of Lady Randolph Churchill and in Mr. Ralph Nevill's "Piccadilly to Pall Mall" (Duckworth & Co.), something is said of that mad worship of the woman's face which swept over the English world in the late 'seventies and early 'eighties of the last century. It was the day of the "Professional Beauty," whether she did actually make a profession of her charms or only used them as an amateur to win applause and admiration. There were some half-dozen, or perhaps half-a-score, of women whose loveliness was a national passion. Two or three were well born and married; others were "actresses," at least, by convention; some did not even make pretence to any social status at all. It mattered not. To only a few were they real beings, who dined out, or played at the halls, or consorted with young men about town. In London people would sometimes stand on chairs to look at them in the Park, or mob them in drawing-rooms and at private views. But most men, I imagine, scarcely thought of them as creatures of flesh and blood, who lived somewhere in houses, and wore clothes and took them off; but rather as fair abstractions, the images of an ideal exquisiteness of physical perfection. To the thousands who gazed upon their portraits in the shop windows, or caught faint glimpses of their features crudely rendered on the lids of chocolate-boxes and in other poor reproductions, they were goddesses revealing their glory from the empyrean to worshippers on this clouded earth.

Commentators then and since have spoken slightingly of this "craze." I do not know that it deserves the term; it was less a craze than a cult, and one not without its elements of nobility and reverence. True, the objects of all this adoration were perhaps (I do not know) only frivolous "society" dames, or sometimes, it may be, light damsels whom our fathers would have called wantons. But in the emotion they created there was little of vulgarity or animalism. The portraits displayed of them were nearly always delicate, and so far as the coarseness of the medium allowed refined. They were fully arrayed in garments that represented to the contemporary eye the type of feminine elegance. Whether they were ladies or not, their habits and demeanor were those associated with aristocratic, luxurious womanhood. They were not to be confused with the half-naked females then just beginning to expose themselves to the camera and now sprawling tumultuously on all sides. We have come to live amid an orgy of nudity, exhibited in the ball-room, at the theatre, on the stage, in the street: every man of us has become a Peeping Tom whether he will or not. Crowds press to the music-halls to gaze on women who cannot dance, who are not even beautiful, whose sole attraction is that they are very nearly undressed; a whole brood of illustrated newspapers, at sixpence for the genteel, at a penny for the multitude, thrives on this art of the baignoire and the alcove. Compared with it our riot of indecent inquisitiveness, the late-Victorian love of lovely faces seems reticent and chaste. To many thousands of clerks in offices, of assistants in shops, soldiers, sailors, settlers far away in the bush and the backwoods, the cheap framed photograph was like the picture of the Virgin or St. Catherine to some Catholics: a type of goodness and purity as well as beauty, a revelation of the ideal womanhood that hovers dimly before most men's minds at some period of their lives.

Several years ago I was in the log hut of a prospector in the mining district of British Columbia. With two companions I had lost my way, and was compelled to seek refuge for the night in this little cabin. The owner was a good-looking young Canadian from an Ontario farmstead who received us hospitably and did his best to make us comfortable. The furniture and appointments of his one small living-room were as scanty as is customary in those parts. There was the usual miner's equipment—picks, shovels, high boots, a shot-gun, a rough pine table and some stools, a bear-skin robe; for literature, a mining manual, a text-book of mineralogy, several worn paper-covered novels; and for ornament some colored prints from the Christmas numbers of illustrated newspapers on one wall, and on another, above the stove, three photographs. One was of a side-whiskered elderly gentleman, another that of a comfortable middle-aged matron: our host's parents, no doubt. The third was more arresting. It was a reproduction of perhaps the loveliest of all the lovely faces which had been wont to gaze from the shop windows during that era of beauty-worship whereof mention has been made. One could not look at it, familiar and almost hackneyed as it had become, without a start of surprise that Nature had made anything so perfect. The delicate symmetry of the features, the exquisite modelling of the chin, the soft sweetness of the lips, the grace of the smooth hair rippling low over the forehead, were only part of the indefinable charm of a countenance that seemed bathed in an atmosphere of virginal purity. The impression was heightened by a kind of hood suggesting that of a nun which loosely draped the girl's head, and by the rapt eyes turned a little upward as if in prayer. It was the face of a young saint, the index, one might believe, of a soul as beautiful as its outer vestment.

Unfortunately the picture prompted no such reverential thoughts in one of my companions, a gentleman well acquainted with the gossip of the London coulisses for long past. "Hallo," he said, taking the portrait from its nail, "there's little ——"; and he mentioned the lady's name with a brief and somewhat indecorous allusion to her career, which had been by no means so edifying as her appearance suggested. As it happened, our host, who had gone into the outlying shed to fetch provisions for us, came into the room at the moment and caught the flippant remark. He dropped the tin pot he was carrying with a clatter; a dark flush surged through the healthy bronze of his cheeks; and with a rough Western oath he strode across to my friend so fiercely that I feared he was about to strike him. The Londoner turned in surprise. "I beg your pardon," he said. "I thought——" The Canadian controlled himself with an effort. "See here, mister," he said, "I don't want your thoughts and I don't want your words about that—that picture. It's got nothing to do with you."

"Of course not. I only said—but I am sure I apologise if I have hurt your feelings. I didn't know the lady was a friend of yours."

"I guess," said the young fellow slowly, "she is a friend of mine in a manner. Anyway, we've got no call to talk about her."

His brow cleared, and he remembered the duties of hospitality. "Just sit down to the table. I reckon you'll be ready for your supper."

He took the portrait quietly from my friend and hung it on the wall again. No more was said on the subject. We gathered round the pine board and fell to on the corned beef and the lake trout with an appetite born of many hours in the open air. Warmed by food and tea and rye whisky and much tobacco, we all grew conversational and expansive. Our Canadian proved a genial entertainer, a wholesome, cheery, sanguine youngster, full of confidence in himself and his pioneering work in this new land, intellectually a little raw, but with the shrewd colonial instinct for realities. Our talk was of mines and prospects and the local politics and many other things. We smoked and drank and played poker, and the hours sped lightly. It was past midnight when my two friends retired to the other apartment of the shanty, our host's bedroom; the Canadian and I were to sleep in the living-room.

"Well, I suppose we had better turn in, too," said the young man.

But I lingered, and suggested a final pipe. I wanted to hear about the portrait. I got up and looked at it again. The young man's eye followed me, and I thought I would risk something.

"Was she really a friend of yours?" I asked.

He laughed lightly enough. "No, sir, of course she was not; I never saw her. How should I? I guess she doesn't come to Canada, and I have never been in Europe."

"You don't know anything about her but her name?"

"No; and don't want to. I just got that picture because there ain't no face in the whole world like it—no, not one. Well, you look at it; you can see for yourself."

"Certainly," I replied, "it's very beautiful."

"Beautiful! I suppose so. But that ain't it so much. You see, we live a rough sort of life out here, and the men I meet—yes, and the women, too—they can't say things that a chap wants to hear sometimes. Perhaps you don't know what I mean; but when I was a boy at home in the East with them"—he jerked a thumb towards the parental portraits—"I thought a lot of religion and used to go to chapel a good deal. Well, when I came out here somehow it all went away from me; it didn't seem real, and I used to wonder how I could have believed all them queer Bible stories and the flapdoodle the ministers talked. I was down in Revelstoke, and I got about in the saloons and other places with the boys, and had a pretty lively time. But I tired of that, too, after a spell, and was at a sort of loose end, and then one day I saw that picture in a shop window and I bought it and put it in my room. I tell you, sir, I was a bit sorry I had got it at first. I couldn't get away from those eyes of hers. When I came in after a bit of a burst she seemed to be talking to me. 'Dicky Drummond,' I almost heard her say, 'Mr. Richard Drummond, are you doing the sort of thing you think you like? Are you doing the sort of thing you think I'd like?' Well, it got on me, and I chucked Revelstoke and came out here."

"A very sensible thing to do," I observed.

"I should say! I am going to make money, you bet. That claim of mine, you know——" and he relapsed suddenly from sentiment to very practical matters, as is the way of healthy youth. But presently he went back to the other theme. "I believe she brought me luck. Anyway, she brought me something else. When I come in and out, or after I have been down with the boys and playing euchre and so on, I want to look at her and think there's somebody like that in the world—with those eyes."

"You will be getting married some time, you know, Mr. Drummond," I said. "Haven't you ever thought of it?"

"I have thought of it," he said. "There's a girl down here now at the township—she ain't like that one there, but she's a mighty good sort. Well, I dunno." There was a pause. "Say," he broke out suddenly. "You live in London when you are at home, don't you? Yes; well now, I suppose you might see her," and he indicated the portrait, "some time. You might tell her from me——"

I laughed. "My dear friend," I said, "do please consider that, in the first place, the photograph from which that one of yours is copied was taken a dozen years ago at least. The original is"—I looked at his face, and my sentence did not end quite as I had intended—"is—married, I daresay, or perhaps she is dead. At any rate, I do not think she is in London. And if she were, there are about ten thousand chances to one that I shall never come within speaking distance of her."

"That so? Well, of course. I guess I have kept you up too late talking nonsense. You have got to make an early start to-morrow, you know."

It must have been nearly twelve months later that I received a letter in London with the British Columbian postmark outside and something stiff within. I opened the envelope and read:—

> "Dear Sir,—Mr. —— was along here the other day and I took your address from him. Perhaps you recollect that evening you got lost on the trail, when you and me sat up talking after your friends turned in. I thought you might like to know that I got married last fall. Enclosed please find portrait of Mrs. D. I guess you'll think I am a lucky man when you look at it. She is as good as she is pretty, just about as good as they make them. The claim is panning out O.K., too, so you see I'm getting it bully all round. I am sending you another portrait, that one you noticed on my wall. Mrs. D. she don't like it much, and I ain't so fond of it as I was, now I have got Annie to look at, which is better than cardboard anyway. But somehow I didn't care to put it in the stove, and I thought you would not mind if I sent it to you. Excuse me for troubling you. I am building a new house, and when it is done, you can have a better shakedown than I gave you that night; so if ever you are in B.C. again, don't forget to come along here and see me and Mrs. D. and, maybe, a kid or two before long.—With kind regards, I am, dear Sir, yours truly,
> "Richard Drummond."

I set the two photographs before me on my writing-desk. "Mrs. D." did not altogether belie her husband's eulogy. She had prettiness of a kind, the trivial prettiness of youth and good nature, a dimple in the cheek, simpering conscious eyes, hair lying in a ringletted "fringe" above an insignificant brow, a suggestion of cheap finery about the neck. The pure and noble face in the nun's drapery seemed to smile with a gracious indulgence on its commonplace rival. So my young pioneer had gone the way of many men before him, and had got his feet upon the comfortable earth after a brief flight into the azure. He had descended upon the Real Woman, and would make her, I daresay, no worse a husband for having conversed for a space with the Ideal.

THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE SMALL HOLDINGS ACT.

Sir,—The two letters which appeared last week on the subject of Small Holdings present, at least, a remarkable contrast. While "A Liberal" holds up his hands in pious alarm at the damage that may be done to "the prestige of the Government" and "the fortunes of the party" by the criticisms that have appeared, Mr. Beaumont, from an experience which no one will question, is driven to admit the case against the Board. It is, he says emphatically, "only too true." Where last year, touring through villages, up and down the country, on behalf of the Small Holdings Society, he was met by eager interest and hopefulness, this year, on revisiting the same places, he finds the men despondent and even hopeless. The reaction has already set in; petty tyranny and boycott are doing their work; the trust in Lord Carrington is weakening; direct hostility is shown to the Act; the Board is inactive and acquiescent.

Against such evidence as this of Mr. Beaumont's, who has at least the courage to give his name, all this talk of "A Liberal" about the fortunes of the party and the prestige of the Government has a rather hollow sound. It is, after all, by the work they do and not by such considerations as these that the Government in the long run will stand or fall. At a time when new legislation is almost impossible, we have at least the right to ask that they should administer fully and effectively the Acts which they have already passed. In the case of small holdings, I do not believe it is possible for any unprejudiced observer, who takes the trouble to inquire into the facts, to say that they have done so.

The Act, as is well known, begins by directing that "the Commissioners shall ascertain the extent to which there is a demand for Small Holdings in the several counties, or would be a demand if suitable land were available," and describes, in some detail, how they shall do so. Even in this, their primary duty, the action of the Commissioners has certainly not shown excessive vigor. No complete record of applications has been made; very few independent inquiries instituted; the work has practically been left to the unaided efforts of the Councils. Let us assume, however, as "A Liberal" asserts, that this was really the best thing they could do, that it was unreasonble to expect any more; and that in acting under section 2 (2) of the Act, and calling upon the County Councils "for information and assistance," they have really carried out to the full their duties in this matter.

Very well, then; but what next? What of the Reports which are to follow? For though ascertaining the demand is the beginning of the duty of the Commissioners, it is, obviously, not the whole of it. Let me quote the exact words of the Act, the words which immediately succeed the subsection referred to.

> "The Commissioners shall report the information acquired by them respecting any county to the Board, and shall state whether it is desirable, in the opinion of the Commissioners, that such a scheme as hereinafter mentioned should be made, and may indicate the nature of the proposals which the Commissioners consider ought to be embodied in the scheme."—Section 2 (3).

Now here is a perfectly simple proposition. A plain duty is laid down. It is not contingent upon anything which the County Councils may do or fail to do. There is no discretion given to the Board. The only condition is the acquiring by the Commissioners of certain information, which they are expressly directed to acquire and which it is the duty of every local authority to furnish them, if they ask for it. As soon as they have acquired this information —as presumably they have now done—a new duty arises. They are directed to report it to the Board, and to state whether they think it is desirable that a scheme should be made. That is the only possible interpretation of the words of the Act, and to discuss whether it is desirable to carry out this provision, or whether the time has come to do so, is merely irrelevant. If the information exists, it is the duty of the Commissioners to report it. If they think it desirable that a scheme should be made, it is their duty to say so. In the words of Mr. Corrie Grant, whose book Lord Carrington welcomed as a lantern to light the wayfaring man, and "an admirable exposition of the law in language which he who runs may read,"—though the Act itself is clear enough—"the Commissioners are to make a report to the Board of Agriculture in respect of each county, and in any case where they think that there is a demand for small holdings, and that suitable land is to be got, they are to state in their report that a scheme should be made for providing small holdings, and may, if they choose, say in what manner they consider this should be done."

Here, then, is the duty. How has it been fulfilled? Let me quote from Hansard the official reply:—

> Q. Mr. Morrell.—To ask the honorable member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether any case has yet occurred in which the Commissioners have made a Report to the Board with regard to the demand for small holdings as provided in Section 2 (3) of the Small Holdings Act. [10*th December*, 1908.]
> A. Sir Edward Strachey.—The reply is in the negative.

The answer is a characteristic one. No reasons whatever are assigned. No unnecessary information is vouchsafed. But, unfortunately, so far as it goes, it is conclusive. After nearly a year's working of the Act, in face of an unprecedented demand—a demand common to every county area—in spite of the fact that some county councils have as yet done nothing at all, beyond making preliminary inquiries, and the majority of them very little, the Commissioners have not even begun to carry out this plain statutory duty. Not only have they not made a report in respect of each county, as Mr. Corrie Grant suggests that they are bound to do; they have not made one in respect of any. "The reply is in the negative."

But this is no mere technical requirement, the disregarding of which might be of little consequence. On the contrary, it is the very centre of the machinery of the Act. Without the report no time limit can be set, no default powers exercised, no effective supervision maintained. However urgent may be the case, however backward the council, the Board have no power to intervene. An interval of at least six months must elapse before they can even ensure the preparation of a scheme. Only when the report has been made, and forwarded by the Board to the county council, as they are bound to forward it, if they agree with the Commissioners in thinking that a scheme should be made, does the procedure of the Act take effect. A time limit is then automatically set. For it then becomes the duty of the council to prepare one or more draft schemes "to give effect to the report," having regard to the proposals (if any) of the Commissioners indicated in the report; and if within six months, "or within such extended time as may be allowed by the Board," the county council fail to act, the Board may direct the Commissioners to take action in default. If these reports had been made at once most of the difficulties described by Mr. Beaumont and others would never have occurred. Until they are made, the Board are little better than a piece of stage machinery; able, indeed, to issue circulars and make representations to the councils, which they do with estimable diligence, but unable to secure the provision of a single acre of land.

It is true, of course, that under a succeeding section of clause 3, county councils have the right—though they are under no obligation—to prepare and submit schemes "without receiving any such report"; and many of the councils, as is well known, have already submitted schemes to the Board. For this reason, as "A Liberal" rightly says, it is a perversion of the facts to represent the Act as a failure; and if he had taken the trouble to read the article he was criticising, he would have seen that no such perversion has occurred. On the contrary, it has always been recognised that a few counties have done excellent work, while most of them are doing something. But it is only in a comparatively few places that any considerable progress has been made. Of the 600 applicants who have already obtained land, more than half belong to only three counties. For some thousands of other "approved" applicants no holding at all is yet in sight. Even if much more had already been done, it would not relieve the Commissioners and the Board of the duty which they have still to carry out, or of their real responsibility in this matter. For it is not merely a question of delay. The policy now pursued by the Board of Agriculture is in effect the denial to the applicants of that right of appeal from the Council to a central authority which the Act provides; the refusal of any assurance to these men that, whatever may be the present attitude of the county councils, their case, if it is a sound one, will ultimately be met. They may be threatened with dismissal, they may be deprived of their homes, for making application under an Act of Parliament; and they have, at present, no compensation or redress. In spite of Lord Carrington's pleasant optimism, they are bitterly beginning to see that all the talk about Small Holdings Commissioners, who would be above local prejudices, who would supervise the work of the county councils and be ready at once to take action in default, has been, so far, an empty boast.

The policy of the Board of Agriculture up to now has been simply a policy of not carrying out the provisions of the Act. If Liberalism is to retain its credit in country districts, it is more than time that a change should be made.

PHILIP MORRELL.

Letters to the Editor.

THE CHARACTER OF THE CHURCH COUNCIL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have been asked by several clergymen to make a statement as to the unrepresentative character of the self-entitled Representative Council of the Church of England. They feel, as I do, aggrieved at finding the resolution of this Council taken as the voice of the Church, and themselves thereby committed to opinions and actions from which they in many cases entirely dissent. It seems specially desirable that the truth on this subject should be pointed out when the supposed authority of the Council has been accepted even by the Ministers of the Crown and thus has led to the destruction of the last Education Bill, and of the religious peace which it would have secured.

1. The Council is primarily a conjunction of the two Convocations, each house of which resolves itself into a Committee for the purpose of meeting in London. But the Convocations do not represent the Church, nor even the clergy. The laity who are added are elected by very loose processes, which are so contrived that, with few exceptions, those elected are sure to be clericalists. But the Church of England is national, not clericalist.

2. No sanction was given by the Crown to the formation of this Council. Yet without this sanction it has no legal position. The few informal words, spoken in courtesy, by the King, in answer to the address of the Convocation of Canterbury in 1906 cannot give such a sanction. The Council is nothing more than a conspiracy, and a conspiracy aiming at a usurpation.

3. No attempt has been made to define the scope and powers of the Council. Is it a legislative, or a judicial, or an administrative body? It can be none of these without usurping the prerogative of the Crown. I tried, before the Council was fully formed, to obtain a declaration of the aims of those who were promoting it; but no answer was vouchsafed, except the statement that the thing was going to be done. It remains, therefore, merely an assembly for discussion, without authority and without responsibility. As such, it cannot be other than a source of misunderstanding and of danger.

4. There is a large body of opinion, I believe that of the majority of Churchmen (if we mean by that word simply English Christians who have no quarrel with our present system of government), who are quite content with the regulation of Church affairs by the national organs—by Parliament for legislation, by the Privy Council as the final Court of Appeal, by the Ecclesiastical Commission for finance. The number of those who would hand over these functions to the "Representative Council" is infinitesimal. Yet this unauthorised body is allowed to create dissatisfaction, to hinder reforms, and gradually to attain a supreme power for mischief.

5. I wish to add one word more. Church opinion must be grounded on religious conviction. Those who have given the Church a bias towards separation and clericalism have taken their stand upon the exaggerated views of the importance of the clerical function, which were introduced by the Tractarians some seventy years ago. These exaggerated views are, as everyone can see, losing their hold on men's convictions, partly through argument and research, partly through fact and experience. What is taking their place is the conviction of the superior importance of the Christian life, that is of justice, truth, and love, not merely as preached, but as lived out, and this not by the individual only but by all social aggregates, and most of all by the nation which includes them all. To those who think thus—and their number is large and increasing—all family life, all municipal, social, and political life, is religious, and such measures as those which tend to good education, to temperance, to the care of children, from whatever quarter they come, are great acts of religion, of the national service of God. That is the meaning to us of what is called the Royal Supremacy over the Church—which is really the National Supremacy over the clergy and the functions administered by them. The nation, not the clergy, is to rule in England. We refuse to allow a body limited by special forms of doctrine or of worship to hinder those great developments of justice and brotherly love which can only be wrought out by the power of the Christian nation.—

Yours, &c.,

W. H. FREMANTLE.

THE GOVERNMENT AND PUBLIC OPINION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—A considerable experience of recent by-elections enables me to supply the following information which may be useful to the Liberal leaders in deciding what course they should adopt in the present political crisis. The more facts they have at their disposal the more likely they should be to come to a wise decision.

Up to and including the Newcastle election, when Tariff Reform as a cure for unemployment was the deciding factor, the opinion was general that the influence on the electors of the militant Suffragist agitation was insignificant. But this certainly was not the fact at Mid-Essex, where the effect of their very energetic propaganda was undoubtedly considerable. In the villages the novelty of their methods and the natural curiosity of the inhabitants rendered simultaneous Liberal meetings utterly impossible. When we were unfortunate enough to be brought into competition with them we had to wait the termination of their eloquence and then address a more or less hostile gathering. The matter of their speeches must also have appealed strongly to the unsophisticated villagers. They painted lurid pictures of the sweating of country girls in London drapery stores, tea shops, &c., who were driven on the streets to supplement their meagre wages of 5s. and 6s. per week. It was stated to be a not unusual practice for managers of business houses where the "living-in" system obtained to supply the girls with latch-keys to enable them by immoral practices to secure the sufficiency of food and clothes their daily labor ought to have provided. These social evils were, of course, to be remedied when women had got votes and, in the meantime, "Vote against the Liberal." Naturally, statements of this character appealed strongly to the average elector, and there can be no doubt that many votes were influenced thereby.

Again the women held dinner-hour meetings at each of the principal works in Chelmsford regularly for some days before the poll, thus effectually blocking the Free Trade speakers who were not allowed by the audiences to compete with the Suffragists, they, by the way, using all their sex privileges on such occasions, the hard-working Free Traders being compelled to seek casual audiences at street corners.

Another point which tells against Liberal candidates is the persistent propaganda being carried on by branches of the Tariff Reform League in almost every English county. Taking Mid-Essex alone, I was credibly informed that Chelmsford had a branch containing at least one hundred active workers, and Brentwood one with five or six times that number, besides smaller groups in several of the villages. There can be no doubt that some form of moral compulsion had been exercised in organising these bodies, but their existence is certainly a factor to be reckoned with. They are well supplied with literature, arrange public meetings and lectures, and canvas energetically all the year round.

The question of the House of Lords has not so far been prominent at by-elections, but I have been enabled to gather that there is a general feeling throughout the country that the Government do not mean business. The peers' contemptuous rejection or mutilation of the Education Bill, 1906, the Plural Voting Bill, the Scottish Land Valuation Bill, and other beneficent measures, without effective protest on the part of the Government has disheartened the more earnest workers in the party. This feeling of doubt must at all costs be dispelled or Liberalism is doomed in England. The situation can only be saved by the Government adopting a bold and definite course. Timidity must be banished. Courage is the keynote of the only policy which will again awaken the enthusiasm which wins. The abolition of the peers' veto must be made a living and vital issue, and all other questions made subordinate to it.

I would suggest the introduction of a drastic Radical Budget concurrently with measures dealing with Land Valuation and Unemployment, as a means of paving the way for an effective appeal to the electorate. Bold tactics only will raise the drooping spirits of the rank and file on whom in the last resort the future of the Liberal Party depends.—

THE GERMANISATION OF THE BALKANS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—A copy of THE NATION of November 21st last has come into my hands which contains a letter under the heading, "The Germanisation of the Balkans," dated from Sarajevo, November 6th, at which time I also was in that city on my second visit to Bosnia.

I hold no brief for the Austrians, but I like justice, therefore, I feel bound to protest against what I know to be untrue. Your correspondent states: "Most of the officials are Austrian (meaning German Austrian), a 'Chef de departement' is nearly always an Austrian with no knowledge of the language, habits, or religion of the people he is appointed to rule. No matter how much a young Serb distinguishes himself in school he has no chance whatever of rising in the Government service."

The best answer to this is my own experience of last summer, when I was one of a picnic party on Mount Trebevic near Sarajevo, and had the opportunity of meeting socially a dozen or more officials holding very responsible positions in the Government, of whom three were "Chefs de departements."

There was only one among them who spoke German as his native tongue. The nationality of the others was Hungarian, Italian, Polish, and Czech (Bohemian of Slav race). and all spoke the native language of Bosnia.

I have travelled all over Bosnia Herzegovina with an open mind towards the race question, and while I do not speak Serb, and could not converse with the people, I was very much attracted by them, and formed a good opinion of their intelligence and capability of development. In this I was confirmed by what Austrian officials in the country districts told me of the people they governed.

"The Bosnians are good people," one "Bezirksvorsteher" (civil head of a district) of thirty years' experience said to me, and he proved his trust in them by going everywhere in most remote districts, even during the recent excitement, alone and unarmed. This, I think, was not the speech or action of a tyrant who oppressed the people under his rule; and this is not an isolated instance.

I trust you will kindly give this letter the same publicity as that of "Your Correspondent in the Balkans."—Yours, &c., MAUDE M. HOLBACH.

LORDS v. COMMONS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The necessary background for true Democratic government is the right of revolution, and the statesman who fails to carry through a necessary revolution when the time is absolutely clearly ripe for it, is bound to bring an immense disaster down upon a free country and upon himself.

And Mr. Asquith has now in this matter of dealing with the House of Lords the possibility of a great glory or a great shame to himself and his party. When the Court party attempted to interfere with the French States General, Mirabeau thundered forth upon them, "we are here by the will of the people and only by the will of the people shall we go hence." There is an example for Mr. Asquith, and if he comes short of it he will ruin his party and his own political career at the same time.

The political Mephistopheles who sneers at us from the Opposition front bench will sneer and jeer at anything that comes short of this. To do anything less than this is, under present circumstances, to surrender the privileges of the House of Commons, and the rights of the free British people whom they represent. To go to the country on the question of the present action of the House of Lords is an insult to the electors who put a Liberal Government into office for the express purpose of carrying these very measures which are now cast forth in the dirt-heap by a gang of irresponsible persons whose very existence as a Legislative Chamber is and always has been a standing insult to the rights and privileges of a free people.

This wretched Laodiceanism, this want of self-respect on the part of our elected legislature is ruining the Liberal cause. And if the Liberal Government does not at once proceed to assert the inalienable privileges of the People's House, and to declare at once "that the measures passed by the House of Commons shall be made effective during the currency of that Parliament which has passed them," then let us prepare ourselves for another period of the most disgusting tyranny under which any free people has ever suffered. Does anyone say that "this is a proposed revolution?" Then I am not frightened at that. We have had revolutions in Britain far more severe, when kings and queens were driven from their thrones and lost their heads. The only question is this: "Is it a necessary revolution?" And I firmly believe, and many believe with me, that nothing less will save the party and save the country.—Yours, &c., D. K. AUCHTERLONIE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your issue of December 5th, you refer to the decision of the Court of Appeal by which "the financial and political basis of the Parliamentary Labor Party has been severely shaken" and you state that those affected "are already pressing for a Bill abolishing the new disability." I am amazed to see that you add: "Such a measure may be difficult to frame, and we cannot conceive that the House of Lords will look at a proposal to enable trade unions to turn themselves into political bodies, with a Socialist basis and policy." Is it in THE NATION, of all organs in the world, that we find it laid down that a "new disability" of the most far-reaching character is to be acquiesced in, not because it is just or politic, but because the House of Lords will probably like it? For my part, I cannot conceive a more abject surrender than is implied in such a suggestion, nor, I may add, a more gratuitous one, for if such a measure were sent up to the Lords, they would either accept it, which would be nothing short of an unconditional surrender to the most progressive party in the House of Commons, or else they would reject it, which would bring the whole progressive forces of the country absolutely into line against them.—Yours, &c., PHILIP H. WICKSTEED

THE EDUCATION QUESTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I fear that your readers may be bored to death by the discussion on the Education question; but, at the risk of being an accomplice in so gruesome a murder, I must ask your leave to emphasise some points which were rather thrown into the background in the late controversy, and to add one suggestion which, I think, may be considered a new, but logical, development of Liberal principles.

First, then, I much regret that the Government has never seen their way to make the restoration of the London School Board a plank in their educational platform. I believe that the ad hoc election produces a set of people much more sympathetically interested in both teachers and scholars, and far more likely to choose the right kind of teacher, than can ever be secured by the election of people who have one eye fixed on roads and sewers and steamers, and the other on the schools.

And let me emphasise this second requisite, the choice of the right kind of teacher. Given a sympathetic and intelligent teacher, I believe that there need be no "religious difficulty." I have heard several lessons on the Bible, given in the school of which I am a manager; and while all were, and must be, colored by the special religious feeling of the teacher, in each case it seemed to me that the teachers were hampered by the limitations which confined them to teaching moral lessons. To write a list of virtues on the blackboard seemed to some of the least daring the safest resource; and, though we have a very high average of teaching ability in our school, the danger of this limitation hindering the play of the teacher's thought is really considerable. I do not think any of the teachers would wish to teach Sectarian formulas; but no honest and intelligent teacher can fail to feel irritated at being given a subject to teach, and forbidden to say what he thinks about it.

And do not let the champions of secular education imagine that, by excluding the Bible from our schools, they will eliminate the signs of sectarian and ecclesiastical bias in the teachers.

I heard a most intelligent teacher, in giving an ordinary history lesson, discoursing on the Early English Church Council, which finally decided on establishing the connection of the English Church with that of Rome. The teacher put very clearly the advantages of the union with Rome. I might have wished that she had put the side of independence more plainly; but I saw that she interested the children, and led them to think on the subject.

A far more startling story was told me by a friend, of another history lesson in some country school, in which the teacher told the children that John Bunyan was a bad man, who was rightly imprisoned because he preached without leave or licence! Well! How would the secular champions deal with such a case? The friend, who told me the story, wished that a remonstrance should be made to the head teacher. But where would such remonstrances stop? Next day another teacher might be remonstrated with for approving the execution of Laud or Strafford. If once you hamper a teacher in a given subject, you must prepare the way for a lower standard of teaching. The "right of entry" of teachers, who come in avowedly for special propaganda is undoubtedly disturbing to the good management of the school. But freedom of teaching by the regular teachers is, I believe, the only satisfactory way of meeting that cry. Get a Board who will care enough about Education, and understand enough about it, to choose really intelligent and sympathetic teachers, and then give those teachers their fling. I learnt much, as a boy, from my able and excellent head master, Dr. Moberly; but his unconcealed High Church bias has left no mark on me. I was impressed by Dr. Temple's expression of gratitude to the governing Board of Rugby for letting him so much alone. Is not this the key to the situation?—Yours, &c.,

CET ANIMAL EST TRÈS MÉCHANT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It does not surprise, nor does it greatly distress me, that Mr. Archer should prefer Sudermann's twenty-five years old melodrama to "The Last of the De Mullins." The school of Sardou still has its admirers, and anyone who has followed Mr. Archer's more recent excursions in the field of dramatic criticism, who has noted his entire failure to appreciate or to understand Mr. Galsworthy's "Silver Box," Mr. Barker's "Weather Hen," "The Marrying of Ann Leete," or "Voysey Inheritance," or any of the later work of Mr. Shaw must have recognised regretfully that his dramatic clock stopped going in the early 'eighties. To him what my friend Mr. Robert Ross calls the Tottenham Court Road school of drama represents the last word of construction. The mechanism of the third act of Mr. Sutro's "Barrier," Mr. Pinero's "Mouse in Order" (if the jibe be permitted), have won the tribute of his respectful homage. To that I leave him. But I confess that I find it rather lamentable to see Mr. Archer so completely forgetting the great days when he and Mr. Walkley were sowing their Quaker Oats in the first Ibsen Crusade as to resent my Janet's remarks to her father as "tactless." Could anything be more "tactless" than Norah's remarks to her husband in a "Doll's House," or Mrs. Alving's to her clergyman in "Ghosts," in the eyes of contemporary Fleet Street? Yet Mr. Archer and Mr. Walkley were found to defend them

"O quam mutatus ab illo Hectore!"

Alas that both should now have ratted. This, however, makes it somewhat ludicrous that Mr. Archer's name should have been put forward apparently quite seriously in some quarters as a possible Director for an English Repertory Theatre. It was surely not imagined that we are going to exert ourselves at this time of day to build a theatre and collect subscriptions to bolster up the drama of the 'eighties? If we are to have a Repertory Theatre in England it must be the younger men who will take command. The Ibsen battle has been lost and won. It is the drama of Tchekof and the moderns round whom the battle has now to be fought. For that we need leaders somewhat more abreast of the times than Mr. Archer. I wish I could persuade THE NATION to recognise the fact—as the "Speaker" did before it.—Yours, &c.,

MORE MESSAGES FROM MYERS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In thanking Mr. Graham for his courteous reply to my batch of queries, there seems to me only a couple of sentences in his letter which invite comment. But on the soundness of the statements therein rests the fabric of his assumption of a difference of kind between the mental apparatus in man and animal. He says: "I believe the continuity (i.e., between man and the higher mammals) to be very much broken—broken at the gap which separates the brain of man from that of his nearest animal likeness. Our brains are five times the size of the largest ape brain, and far more corrugated; the human infant four months before birth has a brain equal to that of the adult baboon."

A quotation from Huxley's "Man's Place in Nature" supplies refutation of claim to a difference of kind, based upon cerebral structure and volume.

"The smallest cranium observed in any race of man measures 63 cubic inches; while the most capacious gorilla skull measures not more than 34½ cubic inches. Striking as are these differences, their force is somewhat impaired in view of the differences between men themselves. For the largest human skull contained 114 cubic inches, that is to say, had very nearly double the capacity of the smallest, while its preponderance of 51 cubic inches is far greater than that by which the lowest adult male human cranium surpasses the largest of the gorillas" (p. 78). "The structural differences which separate man from the gorilla and the chimpanzee are not so great as those which separate the gorilla from the lower apes" (p. 103). The only well-marked difference between man and the anthropoid apes is in the third frontal convolution of the brain, which is a fundamental part of the apparatus of articulate speech. But the importance of this fades away before the fact that the series of centres in which the "speech zone" is located is undeveloped in the brain of a baby.—Yours, &c.,

THE "HELPERS" AND THE C.O.S.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In reference to the letter on the "Personal Help," I enclose a reply which came, owing to misdirection, to me about three weeks after I wrote:

DEAR SIR,—In reply to your letter of November 19th, the letter you enclose is only one of many sad cases brought to my notice during the last week, but, unfortunately, by the terms of our appeal, we can only deal with cases which are selected and sent us either by the Central (Unemployed) Body or the Charity Organisation Society. Could you not bring the cases in question before the notice of either of these organisations in your district? —Yours faithfully, VIOLET MARKHAM, Hon. Secretary."

You will perceive that the "Personal Helpers" are a branch of the C.O.S., and entertain no applications unless made through that Society. That is sufficiently illuminating. —Yours, &c.,

THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE SMALL HOLDINGS ACT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Philip Morrell's letter in last week's issue of THE NATION on the administration of the Small Holdings Act very fairly represents a large body of feeling in the country.

Possibly the views of a "County Councillor" who has been actively engaged in the administration of the Act may be of interest.

I think no one who has not been so engaged can realise the vast amount of work that has been thrown upon the county councils by the passing of this Act. The acquisition of land, even between a willing buyer and a willing seller, under an antiquated system of land transference, is always a slow and tedious process, but when one of the parties is a public body, like the county council, the difficulty is increased four-fold.

In this county over 23,000 acres were applied for, and the work of personally interviewing all the applicants, and considering the circumstances of each application, involved an enormous amount of work. Before anything could be done offices had to be found and fitted up and a staff of clerks appointed, and we did not get fairly to work till April. About four months were occupied in holding the inquiries and sifting the applications. During the holiday month of August very little could be done, and it was not till September that any serious progress with the acquisition of land could be made.

Our difficulties are increased owing to this being a county of small farms. There is eager competition for every eligible farm that becomes vacant, and this greatly increases the difficulty of a slow-moving body like the county council acquiring land. The farmers, for the most part, are opposed to the Act, and very little help is to be expected from them.

As illustrating our difficulties I may give one example. A farm of about seventy acres had been offered for sale by auction in October last year, and had been withdrawn owing to the reserve price not being reached. The auctioneer called my attention to it in July; it was found suitable for small holdings, and negotiations for purchase were begun. All went smoothly at first, but when it became known the county council were purchasers, every obstacle seemed to be thrown in our way. The negotiations dragged on for about four months, and I personally have written at least fifty letters to various persons respecting this land. Now, all efforts at a settlement having proved fruitless, the county council has resolved to use compulsory powers, and all the weary work has to be gone through again.

It is all very well to put the blame on county councils, and I grant that many may be half-hearted in the matter, but in face of such difficulties as these it is no wonder the Act moves slowly.

As Chairman of the Small Holdings Sub-Committee for this district, a very large proportion of my time has been taken up this year with its business, and if one who is keenly interested in the work, and most anxious to make the Act a success, finds such difficulty in working it, perhaps it is not surprising that progress has been so slow.

We get very little help from the Board of Agriculture, and I think the Government should have foreseen the onerous nature of the work they were placing on the county councils, and should have provided more efficient help to aid in carrying out the work.

It is a very serious matter for the Liberal Party that such great expectations should have been raised, and the prospects of a general fulfilment should be so indefinite.

Now, on top of all this we have the Old Age Pensions Act to administer. As a valued colleague said to me the other day apropos of a shooting party he had been asked to join: "How can I go shooting when I have to be trotting about all day with an Old Age Pension in one hand and a Small Holding in the other?"—Yours, &c.,

Poetry.

A CHRISTMAS CAROL IN THE OLD MANNER.

Joseph.

MARY, art thou the little maid
Who plucked me flowers in Spring?
I know thee not: I feel afraid:
Thou'rt strange this evening.

A sweet and rustic girl I won
What time the woods were green:
No woman with deep eyes that shone,
And the pale brows of a Queen.

Mary (not hearing him).

A stranger came with feet of flame
And heralded this thing,
Saying, "Thou'rt but a village maid,
Yet shalt thou bear a King."

Joseph.

A King, dear wife? Whoever knew
Kings in a stable born?

Mary.

Do you hear, in the dark and starlit blue
The clarion and the horn?

Joseph.

Mary, alas! lest grief and joy
Have turned thy mind astray!
But let me look on this my boy,
And take the wraps away.

Mary.

Behold the lad!

Joseph.

I dare not gaze:
Light streams from every limb.

Mary.

The winter sun has stored his rays,
And passed the fire to him.

Look Eastward, look! I hear a sound.
Joseph, O what do you see?

Joseph.

The snow lies quiet on the ground,
And glistens on the tree.

Three crowned apparelled men there are
That softly march along.
I see them clear: there shines a star
So wondrous bright and strong.

O Mary, what do you hear and see,
With your brow toward the West?

Mary.

The snow lies glistening on the tree,
And silent on earth's breast.

And strong and tall, with bright grey eyes,
Seven shepherds walk this way,
And angels crowding through the skies
Do sing to them and play.

Joseph.

I wonder much at these bright Kings,
The shepherds I despise.

Mary.

You know not what the Shepherd sings,
Nor see his shining eyes.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

THAT excellent periodical, "The Readers' Review," has been asking a number of distinguished people to give lists of the books they have read during the past year with most interest and pleasure. The lists are even more divergent than one would anticipate, for there is not a single work which receives more than two votes. Three books tie for first place. Lord Cromer's "Modern Egypt" is given by Sir William Anson and Mrs. Humphry Ward; Mr. Gosse's "Father and Son" by Mr. A. C. Benson and Dr. B. C. A. Windle; and Mr. A. E. W. Mason's "The Broken Road" by Sir William Anson and the Bishop of London. Mr. Frederic Harrison's list contains four books, "The Government of England," by Professor A. Lawrence Lowell; "Lollardy and the Reformation in England," by Dr. James Gairdner; "Types of Tragic Drama," by Professor C. E. Vaughan, and "Diana Mallory," by Mrs. Humphry Ward. Mr. E. V. Lucas is satisfied with two, Dumas's "Memoirs" and "The Life of Albert Pell," edited by Mr. Thomas Mackay. It is worth mentioning that all the contributors confine themselves to books published during the past couple of years.

THE close of the year finds many people in this retrospective mood, and it is not without value to glance back upon the chief additions made to the world of books during 1908. There cannot fail to be differences of opinion upon any list of best books, and we shall be pleased to insert criticisms. The guiding principle of our selection has been to give books which either from their subject or their treatment seem to us to have significance and vitality—in a word, books which run a fair chance of being read twenty years from to-day. A BOOK to be called "The Text-Book of the History of the British Empire," will be published next season by the British League of Empire. The work has been prepared under the supervision of an editorial committee of which Professor J. B. Bury is chairman. The editor is Professor A. F. Pollard, who also contributes the section on the United Kingdom, and among the contributors are Sir Frederick Pollock, Mr. H. W. Wilson, Dr. F. W. Pennefather, Mr. E. I. Carlyle, Mr. R. W. Frazer, and Dr. A. J. Herbertson.

MR. ARNOLD BENNETT has just finished a novel, the motive of which is the influence of the "yellow press." The theme seems to attract writers of fiction, as we understand that Mr. Ford Maddox Hueffer is at work on a book dealing with the same subject.

WE learn that a biography of Sir Arthur Sullivan may be expected during the coming year, materials for the work having been placed at the disposal of Mr. Arthur Poyser.

THE English rights of Mr. Clayton Hamilton's "Materials and Methods of Fiction," a book of which some particulars were given on this page on September 12th, have been purchased by Mr. Grant Richards, and an English edition will be issued shortly. The work has been adopted as a text-book in several American universities.

THE new volume of the beautiful series issued by the Cuala Press in Dundrum, Co. Dublin, is, as usual, a model of printing, paper, and appearance. It is a slim book of two essays, called "Poetry and Ireland" (7s. 6d.), and its importance is that it contains one of the few essays of Lionel Johnson that can now be recovered. A selected volume of Johnson's poems has just been issued, but the essays of one of the finest critics of our time are still hidden away in the back files of the "Daily Chronicle" and "Academy," and since the lamentable death of their young author in Fleet Street some six or seven years ago, no one has yet taken the trouble to recover them, though from time to time there has been talk of it. The present essay is introduced by another by Mr. William Yeats, describing the efforts of both poets to free the Irish national poetry from the peculiar rhetoric, which was accepted as art because it was patriotic. It contains many references to John O'Leary, that fine old survivor of the Fenians of the 'sixties, who disappeared from Dublin society quite recently and was among the first to recognise the value of the new literary movement in the country. Lionel Johnson's essay is on the same theme, and discusses the connection between nationality and literature with his invariable knowledge and critical assurance. The Cuala Press has also in preparation a volume of poems by Mr. J. M. Synge, and a new work by Mr. W. B. Yeats.

THACKERAY.*

It is difficult to say what has remained to Thackeray of the wonderful vogue which he enjoyed thirty years ago. We can measure his rival and contemporary, Dickens, far more easily. The general English passion for Dickens has cooled; but he has survived in the "common heart." Newer writers, like Mr. Chesterton and Mr. Gissing have carried on his tradition or fixed his place in letters, and among modern realists with a humanitarian bias, like Tolstoy, and, with us, Mr. Shaw, there is a tendency to establish him definitely as a classic, a tendency which the recent French cult of him has confirmed. No such re-affirmation of Thackeray has occurred. Dickens, the half-educated, with his creaking, mannered style, survives and grows. Thackeray, the scholar and gentleman, who was ease itself, who seems to have caught everything from his eighteenth century forerunners, and yet to have founded an almost perfect manner of his own, has not gained the European world, and seems to have lost much of his ascendency at home. What is the reason? Is it that, with his incomparable way of saying things, he had not enough to say—that, with all his gifts, he was not great enough, that he produced too much first-rate journalism and not enough literature? Lever said of him at a point of his earlier career, that he was a man who "would write for anything, and about anything." This is hardly the whole truth. An incomparable entertainer he continued to the last. But the old criticism of him that he chose to work for the stalls and the dress circle, rather than for the whole theatre, remains a pertinent view of his place in literature. The fastidious audience to which he appealed has changed its fashion; and he suffers with the general reader because his appeal is not varied enough, his subject matter not rich enough, and because his own feeling for his subjects lacked depth and freshness. Thackeray was certainly intelligible to the middle-class and upper-class English folk of the later Victorian days. It is doubtful whether he is so fully intelligible to the succeeding generation. It may be that he will hardly be understood at all by the generation which is to come.

Yet we are glad to see a new popular edition of him (in seventeen volumes, with some not unskilful introductory work by Mr. Saintsbury) if only to revive the memory of his extreme pleasurableness. Was there ever a more agreeable writer than Thackeray? Or a more sincere and delightful sentimentalist? Or a better man to read "in slippers"? Or a greater writer of little masterpieces? Or a more accomplished colorist and dealer in the picturesque? Do our young men affect Disraeli nowadays, and if they do, have they ever read a more brilliant parody than "Codlingsby"? Or a more uproarious extravaganza than "The Tremendous Adventures of Major Gahagan"? Assuredly they will find few better travelling companions than the author of the "Irish Sketch Book," and of the lightly but most happily and truthfully sketched series of Eastern travels called "From Cornhill to Cairo." Since the Mulligan bounded into Mrs. Perkins's drawing-room, and Costigan shocked Colonel Newcome with his song at the Cave of Harmony, there have been no such stage Irishmen. Take him early or take him late, he spreads the same splendidly lavish feast. It is, indeed, possible to maintain that as he refined and elaborated the types on which his bent of mind and observation fixed when he began to write, he did not improve them. The two sketches, "Mrs. Perkins's Ball" and "Our Street," written within a few months of "Vanity Fair," contain almost the whole menagerie of Thackerayan characters, and nearly all the social philosophy of the great novels. Catherine Hayes is largely a cruder and wickeder Becky Sharp; in Lord Methuselah or Lord Crabs appear the sharp foreshadowings of Steyne. Are not the first characters more natural, more lifelike, than the last? There is a savage force about "Barry Lyndon" and "Mr. Deuceace at Paris" which Thackeray never surpassed, or perhaps equalled, in more elaborate work, where his looseness of construction, and his frequent longueurs have to be set against the abundant ease and mastery of material that he exhibits in "Vanity Fair" and its successors. "The Diary of Jeames de la Pluche," we suspect, is in the way of being forgotten; but the setting of that admirable farce is of unequalled vivacity.

It is when these themes were set out on an ampler stage that their essential poverty appears, as compared with the most fruitful method of reflective or pictorial writing. Thackeray upbraided Sterne with his sentimentality and Swift with his cruelty. In truth, he could be as sentimental as the one and as cruel as the other. Swift never wrote a more spleenful study of human nature than "The Fatal Boots," or the drawing of Blanche Amory. Sterne's grief over his dead donkey belongs to the same literary school as Thackeray's prolonged wake over the dying Newcome. But where Thackeray fails as a satirist in comparison with Swift, or Balzac, or Dickens, is that his vision of society as a whole was at once less powerful and less serious. His view of modern courts and aristocracies was practically that of the author of "Gulliver"; but where Thackeray only saw the amusing contortions of flunkeys, the antics of fribbles and time-servers, Swift's gloomy and far-glancing intellect divined a distortion of human nature, a wide perversion of the means of happiness and right living. Yet his presentment of it seemed to the superficial Thackeray only proof of Swift's hardness of heart. And as Thackeray wanted depth he wanted calm, and he wanted courage. A gentle and fastidious soul, he could not bring himself to paint the hard world of lust and vanity and falsehood in the strong coloring of the great satirists. Knowing little or nothing of the life of the poor, he could not see the background of modern existence as the author of "The Chimes," or of "Resurrection," could see it, so that instead of painting great pictures of life, much of his work is of the nature of genre, almost perfect of its kind, but with a limited and often strictly national or even party appeal. And he was too impatient to obtain the effect of irony. He would not let his work speak for itself, but must continually interpret it, re-paint it, play with it, till sense of reality was lost, and the puppet show stood confessed. Balzac does not lecture and persecute Madame Marneffe as Thackeray lectures and persecutes Becky Sharp, letting loose on her a horde of maxims, on which we should have liked to see the vivacious original exercising her wit. But Balzac makes a much more significant thing of the French courtesan's life than Thackeray makes of Becky's. It is an old complaint of him that he is irritable with his bad characters, as if he were half ashamed of having drawn them, and to the impartial school of modern writers his hatred of red-haired women, George IV., the Old Pretender, High Churchmen, and Irish Nationalists, gives him, in the modern world of letters, a prudish and old-fashioned air. In this respect his mind recalls Motley's description of his face and figure. He was a "colossal infant," fretted about life, rather than nobly or savagely indignant about it, as was Swift, or concerned to examine it in a spirit of detachment, like Montaigne. But if he sometimes talked, and thought, like poor Poll, he also wrote like an angel, with an inimitable brightness and lightness of touch. Who would not exchange a sackful of modern stylists for his dancing pen? And what editor would not give his weight in gold for such a ballad-writer, such a parodist, such a draughtsman, such a traveller, and such a wit?

THE MYSTICAL ELEMENT OF RELIGION.*

Baron Friedrich von Hügel is not known to the public as a writer, save by some two or three brochures on Biblico-critical problems interesting only to specialists. In the present volumes he gives us the fruits of a long life of deep study and reflection in the realms of history, philosophy, science, and Biblical criticism considered in their bearing on the more fundamental aspects of religion. The work is crowded—indeed, for the general public, over-crowded—with the riches of his learning and the profundity of his thought. There is much facile writing nowadays on the fashionable subject of mysticism. Here is a book to make such writers pause before the immensity and complication of their task. It is a quarry from which lesser men will quietly deport many a rude block to fashion into neater form. For in its form the hurried reviewer will find a hundred obvious faults to fill a column; nor will he judge it by one of the principles it advocates: that a perfect unification is often a poor one; that the richest character is not the most faultless and orderly. Obviously the central figure, S. Catherine of Genoa, is too slight a peg on which to hang so weighty a treatise. Obviously the author's prolonged and loving study of the Saint has led him to attach value and importance to much that, in other eyes, will seem trivial and accidental. The style, though attractive in its extraordinary vividness and personality, is often labored and full of Germanisms; nor is the writer wholly free from that passion for classification which his philosophy repudiates. Such faults are on the surface. The merits of the work lie below; and will only reveal themselves to hard and patient study. The substance of the book—the theory of mysticism—is to be found in the introduction and in the second volume. In the first, S. Catherine, and two of her disciples, are treated as illustrating that theory, both by the merits and defects of their mysticism. The biographical facts of S. Catherine's life, as well as her literary remains, have been sifted and established by a searching scientific criticism that only a Bollandist will duly appreciate; yet which was plainly necessary in order to avoid erecting a theoretical structure on an imaginary experimental basis.

As religion is but one, albeit a principal, factor of a full and perfect life, so mysticism is but one factor of religion, and can be developed safely and fruitfully only in harmony with its co-factors—the institutional and rational elements. For religion is of and for the whole man. It is at once corrupted by the neglect of any of its factors; it degenerates into mere externalism and superstition, or into a hard, loveless intellectualism, or into a morbid dehumanised unearthliness. This theme is unfolded very powerfully in the light of religious history and philosophy. The purifying self-decentralising effect of science, of occupation with the irresistible law-bound determinism of Nature; the spiritual gain deriving from the effort to unify the scientific with the mystical and institutional tendencies, is one of the most original and daring points of Baron von Hügel's religious philosophy.

If mysticism is, not without all reason, discredited in certain quarters, he makes it abundantly clear that its abuses are due to the neglect of its two co-factors. There is no living problem connected with religion as a whole, or with any one of its three elements, that does not receive careful and patient attention in these pages. In no sense is their treatment apologetic, and if, on the whole, the position established is, in substance, Catholic, we feel that the author does not think thus because he is a Catholic, but is a Catholic because he thinks thus. And, indeed, some of his conclusions will not satisfy that more rigid and rampant sort of orthodoxy which to-day would monopolise the name of Catholic and would find it hard to come to terms with S. Catherine of Genoa or S. John of the Cross.

At times, perhaps, we ask ourselves: If religion is such a complex and difficult affair; if we have always to be herding together its innumerable elements and keeping them in marching order, what is to become of "the man in the street"—of the poor to whom the Gospel is preached?

Baron von Hügel answers, in substance, that the problem is as simple as that of walking, and, in practice, is solved the same way. But analyse that practically simple function in such a way as to explain and guard against its possible perversions, and you will seem to describe something far too complex for any mortal to accomplish.

There always have been, and there still are, thousands of simple Catholics and others who lead this seemingly complex, carefully balanced mystical life even in these days, when the institutional side of Catholicism is trying to exterminate the mystical and rational and bring about the complete triumph of formalism.

A PERSISTENT WOOER.*

Readers of the "Courtships of Queen Elizabeth," "The Great Lord Burghley," "Queens of Old Spain," and "Philip II.," will probably feel that they have already made the acquaintance of "Two English Queens and Philip" before, while the suspicious may be led to anticipate new books from Major Hume on "The Year Before the Armada," "The Four Wives of Philip," or, better still, "Three Queens, the Great Conspiracy, and Sir Francis Walsingham." The fiat seems to have gone forth, however, that for foreign marriages (so long as they are not Germanic), as for Mary Queen of Scots, outlawed Stuarts, and the family of Napoleon Bonaparte, the appetite of the reading public of these islands is chronic and insatiable. The material for all these fascinating topics alike seems to be practically illimitable, and Major Hume at any rate knows how to make the most of it. In years gone by Froude was censured for his excessive use of the long-winded despatches of Feria, Quadra, and De Silva—how familiarly the names of these formidable gossips seem to trip off the pen—and, although he gave detailed references, we were solemnly warned not to believe a quarter of the sentiments ascribed to them. Major Hume is far more summary in the annotations to which he treats the inquiring reader. "Brussels Transcripts I.," "Munoz's Narrative, Sociedad de Bibliofilos," or "MSS. Simancas, Estado 808," are the types of reference to which he accustoms us. Granting for the moment that in a book of this kind it is necessary to supply such foot-notes at all, it is open to question whether the particulars given are not still left a little bit sketchy in the improbable case, for instance, of anyone wanting to test the accuracy of some specific transcription from the "Brussels Transcript." We talk of the inexhaustible patience of the readers of "Clarissa," but it is a mere trifle compared with that of the readers who follow the tortuous windings and unfathomable surmises of these Spanish diplomatists. Their intrigues are more than Machiavellian, their omniscience almost superhuman, and yet when things happen there is nothing (unless it be the truth) which seems to surprise them more than the actual course of events:—

> "To the delight of the Imperial envoys, but still, apparently, to their bewildered surprise at the failure of all their predictions, Mary was proclaimed, both in the Tower and the City, amid the frantic joy of the people. Bonfires blazed, feasts were spread, wine ran freely in London, and coins galore were scattered; for the rightful Queen had come into her own at last, whilst the 'nine days' Queen'—the poor fated girl in the grim fortress that had been her only palace—found herself a prisoner instead of a potentate; and the cowardly craven whose tool she had been was basely striving to win mercy, if not favor, from the proud Princess whom he had injured beyond forgiveness."

Here, at any rate, are adjectives "galore"! When once he has got away from these introductory splashes of color, Major Hume settles down to his work and becomes more credible. We always took the stories of Philip's sea-sickness and violent horror of English beer to be merely Froude's fun. There seems little doubt that Mary fell in love with her cousin at first sight, which must have been good news for Charles V., who appears to have had an idea that he himself held the first place in the lady's secret affections. Philip regarded her as a saint, without eyebrows, badly dressed, and, in short, a very nauseous potion, the more so inasmuch as she spoke little or no Spanish. He behaved with commendable tact during his enforced sojourn in England, but when he found himself in Brussels in September, 1555, after his thirteen months' penance, his revenge for his good behaviour alarmed his father, and nearly caused a financial panic.

Few things convey a nicer idea (if that be the word) of Philip's extreme prudence than his relations with Elizabeth. For three years before she came to the throne he worked hard to secure her goodwill, which was almost as essential to him as was his affection to her unfortunate sister—who during the last months of her reign had become as ineffectual as a shadow. The peculiar powerlessness of the very great forms a background, not without pathos, to the whole book.

The first four chapters, on Mary, seem to us by far the best composed. The last five, dealing with Elizabeth, form in some respects an anti-climax, and are so crowded, and, in some places, hurried, that one is often at a loss to follow the writer's precise train of thought. On page 197, for instance, the sequence of events is so elliptically sketched that the reader might well be excused for thinking that the League, "secretly cemented at Cateau Cambresis" (in itself rather a hazardous expression), was broken up during the reign of Francis II. by the joint efforts of Catharine de Medici and the Guises! The complexity of French history from the Massacre at Vassy right down to the murder of Henri III. is so appalling that these rapid dashes into it are greatly to be deprecated from the point of view of the general reader. The political course of Elizabeth is surely devious enough to occupy the whole attention of the most scrupulous reader without the distraction of the Queen Mother of France. "I am afraid," wrote the Spanish ambassador, characteristically, of Queen Elizabeth, "that one fine day we shall find this woman married, and that I shall be the last man in the country to learn anything about the matter." We can see now, so clearly, that war with Spain was impending, inevitably, for just upon thirty years. The result was marvellous enough. But still more so is the impunity with which Elizabeth went on steadily filling the cup of provocation, while maintaining diplomatic relations almost uninterruptedly down to 1584. To begin with, Philip's hand was politely refused, and the papal nuncio declined admittance into England; Spanish trade was boycotted, and in 1568 Philip's treasure in various English ports was seized and Alva's troops, in consequence, starved; England's frugal but steady aid of the Netherlands thwarted the imminent pacification of Flanders; the shelter afforded to privateers in English ports cut off all communication beween Spain and Antwerp by sea; the depredations of Drake carried havoc into the overseas dominion of Spain, while the asylum given to the Portuguese claimant seriously compromised Philip's hold over Portugal. And the only tangible satisfaction that he got in return for over a quarter of a century's incessant baiting was the delicate tormenting of a few of Salvation Yeo's comrades in the prisons of the Inquisition, until—the Armada!

THE MOUNTAINS OF THE MOON.*

It will be something of a disappointment to many readers that the Duke of the Abruzzi has not himself written this story of his climbs among the mountains of the moon in the summer of 1906. Those of us who then saw his photographs and heard him lecture in London cannot but doubt that he was fully capable of writing such a book. He has chosen as his scribe and chronicler Signor Filippo de Filippi, who, though he did not accompany the expedition, accomplishes his task with credit. The splendid photographs taken by that king of mountain photographers, Signor Vittorio Sella, have been largely reproduced in this book, and immensely add to its interest. For here the English reader can see for himself the panoramas of that mysterious region which was known to Herodotus, and seen dimly by Stanley, but never properly explored until the expedition of the great Italian Duke. On the maps of Africa drawn in the time of Ptolemy we can see these mountains sketched far away to the South of the Nile, but it is an extraordinary fact that until quite recent times their very existence was held in doubt. And yet we now know that here in the recesses of these hills are the glaciers from which descend the waters that afterwards form the Nile. Here is that "Source" so long sought for, so often despaired of.

The book is not only a record of climbing. It is also a chronicle of travel in a part of the world which has not before been reached by white men. The Duke of the Abruzzi, of course, had to penetrate across Uganda from the east coast right into the heart of Africa in order to arrive at these mountains. The early chapters are given up to a record of this journey, and contain much that will interest both the scientist and the explorer, as well as the sporting mountaineer. But the part of the book to which most readers will turn will be the brilliant description of the Duke's final achievement in climbing the highest mountain of the range. When all is said and done, we still continue to test the climber's performances by the simple measure of success. If he fails to reach his summit, we may extend our sympathy, but we can hardly give him our applause. The great merit of the Duke of the Abruzzi as a climber is that he always reaches the top, whether it is the summit of a difficult "Aiguille" in Switzerland or of the highest peak in Africa. The Duke of the Abruzzi really reached the top of the chief mountain in the Ruwenzori region. But he did not achieve that victory with ease, or without perils that would have turned back many other men.

Signor Filippi gives us a deeply interesting account of this achievement, doubtless taken from the Duke's own lips. The Duke and his party were forced, after many days of toil, to camp within a short distance of the summit of the final peak. They had with them only sufficient food for one day, and it was certain that if they did not succeed on the morrow they would have to turn back. They rose at dawn and started in grey weather:—

> "They roped together hastily and in silence. Joseph Petigax and Ollier came first, then the Duke, and, lastly, Brocherel. They began the ascent of the glacier along the way traced by the guides on the preceding day. The great ice plain was reached without difficulty in about one hour. It was 6.30 in the morning, and the peaks which they desired to reach stood before them at a very short distance. They were both covered with snow, and the southernmost, which stood nearest to them, showed a rock precipice on the east side, surmounted by a big cornice of snow, and was joined by a rounded ice col to the northern peak, which was somewhat higher, and from which ran down two ridges, one eastward in a straight line towards the valley, the other north-westward, slightly concave, and terminating in a characteristic shoulder. The peak and the ridges are overhung by a gigantic cornice, supported by a colonnade of icicles and aiguilles of ice, which at a distance seem like a fine white lacework."

Then gusts of wind began to blow from the east and great layers of mist ascending from the valley shut in the party completely:—

> "They continued their way in silence. Without the least uncertainty, with a sure intuition of the right direction, Joseph Petigax made his way through the dense mists and ascended the high plain as far as the foot of the south-east ridge of the southernmost peak. The hard snow, which carried them, allowed them to climb swiftly up the wide snowy ridge, cutting only a few steps at the steepest points. By 7.30 a.m. they reached the top of the first peak. A strong wind was blowing from the east. Round about them the dazzling white of the mist was impenetrable to the sight. Everyone had his mind fixed upon the highest summit, which was only a few hundred yards off, but quite invisible, and they stood there waiting and turning their eyes obstinately northward."

Surrounded with this mist they had to approach the top of the mountain up an almost perpendicular ice wall, and through the cornice:—

> "Where the slope commenced to become steep they put down their rucksacks and other unnecessary impedimenta, and Petigax set to work again. They soon stood nearly vertically one above the other, climbing slowly by the steep steps which Petigax cut in the ice wall, showering down a hail of snow and ice upon the others. Below them the wall was almost immediately swallowed up in the mist, so that they seemed suspended over a bottomless abyss.
> "In this way they reached the bottom of the cornice, where the pendant icicles, joining the upright ice needles, formed a colonnade as thick as the trees in a forest, upon which rested the heavy snow-dome whose solidity was open to doubt. The effect seen through the mist was strange and weird. In their insecure position, holding fast to the steep slope, they had to climb around the ice columns to reach the point where the cornice jutted out from the ice wall in order to find a passage."

At last they found a passage, and one of the guides, literally standing on the other's head, hoisted himself by his ice-axe on to the snow above the cornice:—

> "In this way he hoisted himself on to the top. It was easy enough for the others to join him. The ridge was now vanquished. In a few minutes H.R.H. set foot upon the highest peak of Ruwenzori.
> "They emerged from the mist into splendid clear sunlight. At their feet lay a sea of fog."

From this simple account of how the Duke of the Abruzzi vanquished the highest peak of "Ruwenzori" our readers may gather the spirit of the Duke. It is a record of splendid achievement, and in reading it an Englishman will feel a new kinship between his race and that of Italy. For it is the very spirit of England at its best that is reflected in these pages.

Needless to say, the book is splendidly produced, and the illustrations are worthy both of the famous photographer who took them and the firm that gives them to the world.

CURRENT FICTION.*

WHATEVER Mrs. Mann writes, she always inspires confidence. Whether she is at her best, as in "Olivia's Summer," of "The Mating of A Dove," or at her second best, as in about a dozen of her books, we can always rely on her giving human nature a fair field and no favor. And this is a golden tribute in days when it seems to be the aim of our popular writers to conceal the bread of self-interest under the butter of virtuous sentiment. The chief business of the novelist, strictly speaking, is to probe human motives, to shake the stuffing out of social conventions, and to show us how character behaves under a variety of shocks to our virtue, slight or severe. The crowd is always on the side of the angels; it is doubtless a healthy reaction from its daily life. The novelist has to show us the distance relatively between the crowd's secret motives and its ideals, which is always a delicate matter. And Mrs. Mann's sympathy for human frailty is based on a true understanding of the sins that cost us much, of the virtues that are self-regarding, and of the instinctive graces that flame and flicker in us, imperishably.

Daphne Snare, the heroine of the tale, the slender and refined girl, comes into the bosom of her wealthy relatives, the Bellams, on false pretences. She pretends that her flabby and good-natured mother, an ex-barmaid, is dead, so that she may win in this luxurious haven of rest respite from her cheap, distasteful, and unremitting life of toil in a milliner's shop in Oxford Street. The inevitable price is exacted from Daphne; she has to play up to her pretences, to support them with lies, and she is soon found out by the astute, reserved, and scrupulously honorable Anglo-Indian, Edward Bellam, on vacation in England. Here Mrs. Mann redresses the balance. The Bellams, opulent through their business as brewers, are a kindly, dull, and unimaginative lot. Their virtues cost them nothing, they live on an endless round of country-house pleasures. The younger generation, represented by the eldest son, Archie, of the bull-dog type, and Penelope, the hoydenish daughter, whose interests are confined to the stables and the kennels, are clearly destined by Providence to dissipate the family fortunes laboriously acquired in malt and hops and tied-houses. But Daphne, the impostor, has suffered. She has fought desperately for her own hand under the heavy hand of the sweater, and she is to be forced into the inhospitable world again by the love of abstract rectitude of the austere Edward Bellam. Many is the slip betwixt cup and lip. Archie falls a victim to the charms of the scheming governess, Miss Potter, to whom he proposes; Penelope is saved, in the nick, from eloping with the handsome chauffeur; Daphne has a hand in the rescue of both son and daughter, and Edward Bellam, the grave, blasé, and disillusioned man, cannot help falling in love with the impostor. The story is handled with Mrs. Mann's refreshing, sound common sense. She does not indulge in the weakness of sparing her own sex, and she loves rapping the knuckles of dull and pretentious men. "The Heart Smiter" is not one of her best, but it is a characteristically clever piece of work.

"Amabel Channice" by no means reaches the artistic level of "Valerie Upton," the novel which won for Mrs. Sedgwick her reputation in England—and this is a pity, for we had hoped to see her work grow in subtlety and insight. The situation treated in the novel—that of a woman who, separated from her husband and living in seclusion with her illegitimate son, has to face the day when she is forced to reveal to the latter the scandal of his birth—is too obviously stage-managed, and the dramatic issue has an artificial flavor through the convenient entrances and exits of the wordly Sir Hugh, who, we learn, had pardoned his wife's fault merely in order to get hold of her money. The fact is that Mrs. Sedgwick's blacks are too black and her whites are too white—the common fault with our Anglo-Saxon novelists. In order to reconcile us to the young wife Amabel's "act of madness" in eloping with Paul Quentin, she is painted with unnaturally saintly coloring, and in her twenty years' seclusion from the world the halo of her virtue is too much insisted upon. It is, of course, a matter of degree. But the same fault may be found with the drawing of the stern and priggishly superior son, Augustine. What are we to say of a young man who can confide to his mother that he would "rather never marry than make a mistake. . . . I don't think it's goodness exactly. It's that I so loathe the other thing, so loathe the animal I know in myself, so loathe the idea of life at the mercy of emotion." This is crude art, for Augustine's ascetic Pharisaism is obviously introduced to make the task of Amabel's confession tragically difficult. The relations of mother and son suffer, in fact, from the author's leaning towards religious idealism. And in the difficult art of painting life, nothing is easier than to exaggerate the claims of the moral instincts. Sir Hugh's lightness and shallowness when he is suddenly smitten with the charms of his wife, after a twenty years' separation, is more delicately indicated; but here, again, the portraiture is lacking in finesse. Much better done is Lady Elliston, the woman of the world, when she breaks to the neglected Amabel that her selfish husband, Sir Hugh, has been her lover for twenty years. Mrs. Sedgwick shows, in fact, considerable power when she is drawing men and women who are not figures of this world, and not palpably incarnations of the laws of the Puritan's spiritual healths.

In "Fishers of the Sea" Mr. J. E. Patterson has written an interesting but somewhat confused novel. So far as the book is a close study of the manners, habits, and attitude to life of North Sea fishermen, from apprentices to smack-owners, we have little but praise for it. The author draws with a firm, incisive touch a variety of characters. Pep, the stubborn hero, Buck Gurney, the "second hand," Bruisy, the smack-owner, Mrs. Bruisy, the termagant, Griff, the curate, Giff, the humorist, &c.—all these are living people, and the rough-and-ready philosophy of these hard-fisted and hard-grained toilers is admirably caught, without the least adulteration of middle-class idealism. So far as veracity can go in painting a working-class atmosphere and everyday scenes from the life, Mr. Patterson does admirably, but his weakness lies in his failure to create an organic whole out of his variety of scenes and sketches. His plot is founded on a doubtful psychological issue: the hero Pep, at the age of twenty, throws his rival Paul overboard in the course of an enraged struggle on a dark night. But the act is manslaughter, not premeditated murder. Pep shortly afterwards marries Helen Bruisy, his rival's sweetheart, and becomes a leading man in his native town. While success attends his domestic affairs and his business enterprises, the ghost of his old misdeed would surely have grown fainter and fainter in the course of his growing activities. But the author shows its sudden resuscitation after a dozen years, when Pep, as an employer, has to face a storm of unpopularity and a strike among his fishing crews. The psychological analysis of his wife Helen's long drawn out suspicions, and Pep's silence and evasions under her reproaches, is unconvincing; and still more doubtful is it that a man of such strong character should have sought oblivion in suicide. Whether or not the author's talent finds its happiest expression in fiction, he undoubtedly shows much power of sympathetic observation, and his style, though unchastened, is full of energy.

Any intelligent man worthy of the name should pass delicious hours, if he surrender himself fearlessly to Miss Beatrice Harraden's "Interplay." The book is a sort of vade-mecum to the mild horrors of suburban femininity with all its fluff and feathers and frills of pseudo culture, and the reader, safe by his fireside, can afford to chuckle softly at Mrs. Ermyntrude Bending's literary "at homes," and her aesthetic pretences and intellectual poses. Miss Harraden draws cleverly enough the suffocating atmosphere of falsity from which the daughter of the house, Bess, at length revolts; and equally telling is the picture of the terrible old tyrant, Aunt Caroline, in the gloomy Victorian interior in Mecklenburgh Square, with her timid dependent, the much-bullied Miss Sparrow. But the figures of sweetness and light, the emancipated girl, Margaret, and the perfect, queenly heroine, Mrs. Harriet River, who has fled away from her brutal and unfeeling husband, with a kindred soul, and is paying the price at the hands of society generally, are also vehicles for a great deal of feminine falsity. What strikes the reader of the four hundred pages of social "interplay" among Miss Harraden's characters is that the women are genuine in nothing except in their criticisms of one another and in their desire to be loved. They are always posing before others and generally to themselves, and their lofty idealism, like their sham aestheticism, is generated by their having to invent dignified reasons for their superfluous existence. The love affairs of the people in "Interplay" are extraordinarily unreal and amateurish. The men, such as Captain Bending, the Artic explorer, and Dr. Edgar, and Paul Stilling, the half-witted mender of violins, are mere pieces of masculine bric-à-brac, invented for the purpose of bringing an appearance of reality into the emotional hollowness of these women's lives. And dearly the men pay for their feminine belongings, for they are patronised and snubbed and chilled and gushed over, and turned into mendacious looking-glasses for the women to view their perfections in. Looking at this picture of life dispassionately, one feels that there is no possible use for the mental and spiritual falsity of the general atmosphere, and that all the women characters, the queenly heroine included, cannot hold a candle to an average hard-working woman who scrubs her own floors and does all the cleaning, cooking, and mending for her husband and children.

In this novel of rustic Norwegian life Mr. Baerlein gives us some vigorous character sketches, and a medley of extremely original observations, reflections, and out of the way chroniclings, with moods strange and whimsical, with scenes sharply etched and sensitively true to the flying moment. It is difficult, one must admit, to get the author's measure, so abruptly does he pass from incisive analysis to general commentary, and so impulsively does he weave into the text of his story wayward musings and dramatic stories that, strictly speaking, are outside the picture. Many of the scenes are admirably painted, such as Berent's wedding and Carl Greding's death. The passages between the women in the tale, too, are marked by much intimate feeling. But we must confess that the thread of the book is too tangled by the author's innumerable digressions for us to see it as a whole. Clarity is wanted, and if the author could learn to select and discard material, we should enjoy his humor and fall under the spell of his picture of life in a manner that "Yrivand" cannot compass for us.

Mr. Orel draws for us with an audacious pen the course of events when Turkey is "on the European carving-table." His hero, Lyall Forbes, is the guiding star of the Balkan Committee, and the views of Vienna, St. Petersburg, and Berlin, not to speak of London and Paris, are set before us in a set of vivid pictures when the war between Turkey and Bulgaria has stirred all Europe. There is considerable vraisemblance in the description of the battle of Adrianople seen through the eyes of the English war correspondents. The novel, which is dedicated to the Young Turks, ends with a vision of peace and prosperity dawning in the lands of the Southern Danube.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

It was a happy thought of Mr. Christopher Stone to ask Sir Ian Hamilton to write an introduction to his collection of "War Songs" (Clarendon Press, 2s. 6d.). The General is himself a poet among soldiers, "a very perfit gentil knight," full of high imagination, always ready to do battle for a lost cause, and not only able to assume a courage, as most British soldiers can, but apparently quite unconscious of fear even in the greatest peril. He was the man to speak on war songs, and it is a very charming and spirited introduction that he has written. On the whole, though England has about half a dozen of the greatest sailor songs, we should say she is poor in war songs compared to most European nations. Germany, certainly, is far richer, and there is nothing in English to compare to "The Old Field-Marshal"—the song on Blücher, beginning "Was blasen die Trompeten?" In passing we may notice that one war song of the Somersets, called "High Germany," is quoted by Sir Ian Hamilton as beginning in a similar way—"O don't you hear the bugles, the route at last has come," but in the text the inferior version is given, "Oh, Polly love, oh, Polly, the rout has now begun," which shows how much a matter of tradition the best songs are. The "rout" is, of course, a mistake for "route," the compiler perhaps not knowing that by regulation the two words are pronounced the same in the army, just as horses are by universal consent called 'orses. But the old songs are dying out or are kept only for official occasions, as when the Lincolns fan the camp fires with the "Lincolnshire Poacher," which, to be sure, is not a war song at all. Sir Ian Hamilton laments the appearance of music-hall stuff among the men, and certainly it cannot compare with the great songs of old. But even the music-hall has produced "Fighting with the 7th Royal Fusiliers," which brought such a lot of recruits to the regiment that it had to suspend recruiting for a whole year. Why does not Mr. Haldane compose a Territorial song that would bring recruits flocking to the field-days of glory? Mr. Stone has collected war songs of every age and county or border in the Kingdom; and he is not afraid of quite literary poets, like Peacock and Browning. There is only one suggestion we would make—that the music of the finest old songs should be added to the text. English troops, especially from the counties, are always very shy of singing aloud, but it might become popular if the men were given the words and the tune as well.

In his volume, "From Island to Empire" (Chatto & Windus, 6s.), Mr. John Bridge has done, from the purely historic side and in far greater detail, what was, we think, first attempted in Seeley's "Expansion of England," twenty-five years ago. The Professor's book was only an enlargement of some University lectures, but the mere statement of the idea gave it an extraordinary popularity. We are familiar—perhaps, too familiar—with this aspect of Imperialism now, but Mr. Bridge's treatise fills up the gaps in the usual treatment, and presents us with a brief but singularly complete and accurate account of the course of events by which the British Empire has gradually and almost unconsciously been increased. In an introduction, Admiral Sir Cyprian Bridge insists specially on the word "British" Empire, because he maintains the peculiar qualities of each race inhabiting these islands have in turn played their part in the development. Though a sailor himself and yielding to none in his estimate of "sea power," he lays more stress than usual upon the importance of our land forces in extending and securing the British domination. In proof of this, of course, he appeals especially to Clive and Wolfe, but there are plenty of other instances, down to our occupation of Egypt and the South African war, with which the volume concludes. The book is written in the ordinary tone of confident patriotism, but without brag or rhetoric. There are admirable plans and maps in illustration of the principal chapters.

Mr. Baring-Gould's "Cornish Characters and Strange Events" (Lane, 21s. net) is a companion volume to the same author's "Devonshire Characters," published last year. The seventy-nine biographical sketches given in the present work are all readable, though Mr. Baring-Gould cannot be wholly acquitted of the charge of book-making, for most of what he tells us may be found in volumes in no way difficult of access. Still, anyone who interests himself in the vagaries of human nature will enjoy dipping into these pages, for the greater number of the Cornish characters to whom Mr. Baring-Gould presents us were original enough to kick over the conventions in one way or another, even if, as the author claims, Cornwall has produced fewer rascals "than almost any other county, if we exclude wreckers and smugglers from the catalogue of rascality." The list of Cornish men of note is varied, including Sir Humphry Davy, Samuel Foote, Opie, Hugh Peters, Lord Mohun, Sir Cloudesley Shovel, and Trelawney, the author of that lively, if mendacious, volume, "The Adventures of "A GARDEN is a beautiful book, writ by the finger of God," wrote Douglas Jerrold. The perception of the pleasure to be derived from gardening is nowadays far more common than it used to be, and with the taste for this form of recreation the demand for books on the way to obtain it satisfactorily has greatly increased. A gracefully written and enthusiastic contribution to the literature of the subject is Mr. K. L. Davidson's "Gardens, Past and Present" (Werner Laurie, 6s. net). The author deals with English gardens historically; that is to say, he finds that the earliest taste for gardening was implanted by the Romans, and that the Dutch and Flemish immigrants in the sixteenth century grafted a love of horticulture on to the already existing English love of flowers. While the aim of the book is to suggest rather than to give definite directions for gardening, it provides a good deal of solid information on such subjects as herbaceous borders, rock-gardens, "dry-walling," and shrubberies. It is difficult to read the book without catching some of the author's enthusiasm. Photographs of famous gardens, by Mr. F. Mason Good, provide ample and eloquent illustrations. A smaller, perhaps more strictly practical work, is Mr. H. H. Thomas' "Little Gardens, and How to Make the Most of Them" (Cassell, 1s. 6d. net). Here the text is illustrated by explanatory designs, as well as photographs, and countless points of interest to gardeners are indicated by sub-headings. Garden architecture is the subject of the first chapter; others deal in highly practical fashion with the horticulture best adapted to a limited space; a catalogue raisonné of hardy border flowers is appended to the chapter on this topic; and the kitchen garden is not forgotten, since there are hints on growing fruits and vegetables. With a plan or a picture on every other page, this portable little book should enjoy great popularity.

EVERY loyal "Savoyard" will find something to interest him in "Rutland Barrington," by Himself (Grant Richards, 7s. 6d. net)—a most entertaining autobiography, to which Sir W. S. Gilbert contributes a suitable preface. It contains many memories of the original "Mikado," of "Iolanthe," of "The Pirates of Penzance," of "Trial by Jury," of the whole tribe of Gilbert-Sullivan creations; much ingenuous revelation, too, of the way the modern "musical comedy" is wrought between the time it leaves its author's hands and that of its actual production by a skilled caterer like Mr. George Edwardes. Mr. Barrington tells us all about himself and a great deal about the "classic" authors with whom he was associated, about the Cartes, and the members of the companies with whom he has played; neither does he forget to be frank about his somewhat disastrous "artistic successes" as an actor-manager. Throughout his pages there runs a rich, bubbling, Pooh-Bah-like humor, and in regard to "stories," he revives at least one of the genuine Gilbertian gems. It is the tale of the lady who professed a vast interest in music, and by way of displaying her knowledge of composers, remarked to Gilbert, "I do so admire Mr. Bach's music. Can you tell me if he is now composing?" "No, madam," was the answer, "he is decomposing." It was worth going through thirty-five years on the stage to hear this, even—as Mr. Barrington confesses—at second-hand.

MR. T. W. ROLLESTON'S interesting volume, "Parallel Paths" (Duckworth, 5s. net), is an attempt to establish and define the hidden force in evolution, which, in his view, is the moving energy which urges the progress of biology, ethics, and art in parallel paths. In a series of closely reasoned chapters he sets forth the views of modern biologists, rejecting both the Lamarckian view that progress comes from a capacity to transmit acquired variations by inheritance and Weissmann's opposing theory. Mr. Rolleston argues that matter and consciousness must be co-ordinated in some higher synthesis, and that man is an expression of the hidden X force, which is really the invincible "will to live." It is impossible, in a short notice, to give an adequate notion of Mr. Rolleston's theory, or the arguments by which he supports it, but readers who agree with his premise that science has reached a stage when she imperatively needs the aid of metaphysic, will find his book suggestive of fresh lines of thought. His discussion of art, though short, is one of the most interesting sections in the volume. He makes the distinction that literature is strictly neither a presentative nor a representative, but an evocative art, and accepts Tolstoy's statement that infectiousness, the power of moving others, is a primary quality of art. At the same time he rejects Tolstoy's test of the moral quality of a work of art as determining its value, and maintains that "the essential purpose of any art work is to be expressive of life—more expressive than the raw facts of life ever can be." In spite of its brevity, the chapter in which this view is developed is a fresh and valuable contribution to æsthetics, and may be read with advantage by those to whom Mr. Rolleston's biological and metaphysical theories may not appeal.

"TO THE TOP OF A CONTINENT," by Frederick A. Cook, M.D. (Hodder & Stoughton, 12s. net), tells the story of the ascent of Mount McKinley, a peak 20,000 feet high, in the heart of Alaska. The mountain first became known in 1898, when the gold-diggers rushed to Klondike, and Dr. Cook made his first attempt to climb it in 1903. It was unsuccessful, but he tried again three years later, and this time he was just able to reach the top. The difficulties were very great as the mountain rises suddenly out of a low plain, and the base can only be reached by posting through thousands of miles of trackless wilderness. Besides Dr. Cook's spirited narrative, the book contains a large number of illustrations, and there are four appendices dealing with the scientific results of the expedition. Unlike most explorers, Dr. Cook believes that the privileges allowed to the sportsman—whom he always calls the nimrod—should be extended rather than diminished, though his reasons are far from convincing. On the other hand, he would closely limit the liberties of both Indians and prospectors in this respect. Mr. Charles Sheldon gives some interesting details in an appendix about the habits of the Cook Inlet aborigines who now number only about three hundred, though when the Russians first came to the Inlet the population of the settlement was estimated at twenty thousand. The rapid decrease is explained by the introduction of diseases such as measles and whooping cough, which simply sweep away the Indian children. The book is a spirited and entertaining account of a brilliant adventure, and a certain exuberance in Dr. Cook's style may be forgiven as springing from a just pride in his achievement.

THE abnormal is often refreshing; but it is capable of becoming tiresome. It becomes a little tiresome towards the conclusion of Mr. W. R. Titterton's "Studies in Solitary Life" (The New Age Press, 1s. 6d. net), which are nothing if not abnormal; for the author disregards all literary conventions of form and matter, and lets himself go in a style of his own—a style that faintly recalls the literary spasms of certain well-known novelists, without being exactly of the same piece. Mr. Titterton is evidently one of the many modern devotees of the tramp's life and the open road, and the studies in which he pays tribute to this theme are wholesome, if rather ultra-fantastic, and certainly finer in quality than the analyses of human thought expressed under such headings as "A Murder is Reported," "In Praise of Good Eating," or "The Toy-Maker." In these gloomy pictures of crime and poverty the characters hardly ever seem to fit the sentiments they are made to utter, and, penetrative as some of these sentiments are, one is left with a sensation of their incongruity rather than their impressiveness. Neither does Mr. Titterton always discriminate between the subtle and the obscure. Yet the studies contain ideas, and even in the jerky style there is a certain rude vigor, a kind of literary sincerity that promises to bring forth finer fruit in the near future. At present his method of expression suggests too strongly the chaos of a waking dream.

CHRISTMAS has already begun in the Stock Exchange. Business falling to a minimum in many markets, members have turned to more seasonable occupations. With song, and an occasional dance, with practical joking, perhaps carried too far, the House set to work to celebrate the festive season. Charity is active in all the markets. Each day finds new demands sprung upon the pockets, and never does appeal go unanswered if it is children, hungry, forlorn, neglected children, to whom the money is to be sent. It is a singular trait, many think, this love of the Stock Exchange for little children; a trait, however, none the less lovable because, on the face of it, it appears to be singular.

A BREAK IN AMERICANS.

In the cold rawness of Thursday night came the first pronounced check seen for many a long day in the American market. Wall Street was apparently casting shares overboard at an alarming rate. Standing in Throgmorton Street on Thursday evening, at seven o'clock, and watching a few arbitrageurs shouting offers to sell Americans at the lowered prices, one naturally visioned the scene then being enacted on the floor of the New York Stock Exchange. The time there would have been two o'clock in the afternoon, and as members came hurrying back from lunch with orders to sell, the little throngs of Wall Street brokers around each auctioneer's stand could be imagined excitedly engaged in handing in orders to sell shares at what price they would fetch. Rumors by cable reached London to the effect that the banks on the other side were calling in loans on stocks and shares, for the usual end December window-dressing purposes, and money was said to be changing hands at ten per cent. Nor did the report of a speech by Mr. Taft, denunciatory of trusts, help matters, added to which the statement that Venezuela had declared war against the Dutch was another reason advanced for the fall. So prices came down, in a market on this side curiously apathetic to the movement, because it induced little extra business. A break has been anticipated for so long that everyone said to his neighbor, "What did I tell you?" That the expected slump has started in earnest, however, there is considerable doubt. The fear is that the manipulators over the water are possibly trying to induce bears to sell still more shares, in order that the short interest may be rounded up, in true American fashion, later on. But if the wirepullers should lose their grip upon the market—as they might do if money moved against them—little short of a miracle could save prices from a fairly severe fall.

SOUTH AFRICAN DIVIDENDS.

The Kaffir Circus chafes and frets at the continued refusal of the public to take a hand in South African shares in spite of good dividends, good crushings, good labor returns from the mines. Everything the market might be supposed to want in order to attract support to its favorites, is in evidence. One thing only is absent, and, for lack of that, the market remains insipid and savorless. There is no speculation: that is the trouble. A dealer of many years' experience declared that prices and business would be far more active if so large a number of companies had not committed "the unpardonable indiscretion of paying dividends." The epigrammatist, of course, was very right. Than the regular payment of regular dividends there is nothing more fatal to the flourishing of the gambling spirit so necessary if a market is to be active. It is known pretty well in advance what a certain mine will declare by way of dividend at the due time. Quite simple calculations, based on the published monthly and quarterly statements, will enable almost any South African dividend to be forecast within sixpence a share, and thereby is the market robbed of the pleasing excitement of sensational surprises. The fact that such surprises mostly occur in the direction opposite to that hoped for by fond fancy makes small difference to the speculator. All he wants is the chance of a delightful surprise: given that, he will launch his money upon any venture promising to provide the unexpected. But the South African market is no whit the worse for this dearth of animation. The dividends declared this month are good enough to attract the attention of the speculative investor, whose support is of more vital consequence to the market than that of the buyer who gambles for differences, plunges wildly when prices are on the rise, and rushes to sell as soon as the upward movement threatens to turn. Extraneous influences affecting Kaffirs unfavorably are the unrest on the Continent, the Christmas season, the break in De Beers, and the regular end-of-the-year money requirements. In the New Year, a better complexion may appear, though let it be emphatically said that the prospects of a boom are vague and sketchy. A boom is a thing to be deprecated in the true interests of any market, but a steady improvement in prices of the better-class Kaffir Circus shares is by no means outside the pale of practical politics.

CHRISTMAS HOLIDAYS.

A glance through the Excursion announcements issued by the London and North-Western Railway Company in connection with the Christmas and New Year Holidays shows how complete are the arrangements for those Londoners who are desirous of travelling at cheap fares to spend the vacation with friends in Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester, and other Provincial Towns; North, South and Central Wales; Cambrian Coast, Lake District, Blackpool, Scotland and Ireland.

In order to avoid delay at the stations, and for their own comfort and convenience, passengers are recommended (during the Holiday pressure) to obtain tickets on the day before their journey at the L. & N. W. Town Receiving Offices, or at the Booking Offices at Euston, Broad Street, Victoria (Pimlico), Kensington (Addison Road), and Willesden.

The Company have made special arrangements for the collection, quick transit, and prompt delivery of Christmas parcels, which should be carefully packed and plainly addressed.—(Advt.).

SUGGESTIONS FOR CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.
By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information, and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."
—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."

Diary of the Week.

Parliament was prorogued on Monday afternoon, the King's Speech being of unusual length. The only reference to the loss of the Licensing and Education Bills was that "notwithstanding the time and labor which have been given to their consideration, no settlement has been attained." On the same evening Mr. Lloyd George, speaking at Liverpool, made a rattling attack on the Peers, but indicated no countering policy. He said it was "just possible that Parliament may not run its normal course," suggested that Government by "King Lansdowne and his Royal Consort in the Commons" must come to an end, and hinted that if the Welsh Disestablishment Bill were again presented to the Peers and rejected by them, there would be a national Welsh strike against tithes and education rates. As to generalship, he pleaded for trust in the directors of Liberal policy, without, however, suggesting how it would be redeemed.

The second part of the Chancellor's speech was a very brilliant exposure of Mr. Wyndham's sadly foolish speech on Protection. One of Mr. Wyndham's discoveries was that under Free Trade the British nation lent too much money and kept too many clerks. Mr. Lloyd George brought this absurdity home to his audience by illustrating it from the example of the private trader:—

> "Supposing you were a friend of one you knew had started a business. Thirty years ago you found him using some commodity and, of course, keeping clerks. You would find him with three clerks keeping his books, sending out bills, attending to his correspondence. In thirty years you come back and find him with a bigger establishment, turning out more goods and keeping more clerks, and you find, instead of having three, he has fifty, and you say to him, 'My good fellow, I am sorry. When I first knew you, you were really in a prosperous way of business. You only kept three clerks, but now you have actually fifty, and I am told when I knew you, you used to borrow money, but I am sorry to hear now that you have so much money that you are actually lending it to your neighbors.'"

On Mr. Wyndham's proposed taxation of the people's bread, meat, and firing, he retorted that his own scheme of taxation would touch no form of "productive industry."

During the Turco-Greek War a detachment of Greek troops in Epirus found themselves confronted by a body of Turks. The two forces entrenched themselves and began firing at each other. The Turkish artillery was so ineffectual that at last the Greek commander, who at first thought that he was faced by the entire Turkish army, and that there was nothing for it but retreat, ordered a battalion to "advance with caution." As the forward movement developed, the firing from the Turkish entrenchments began to slacken and at last ceased altogether. The battalion, fearing an ambush, advanced with greater caution than ever. But nothing happened, and when the first Turkish entrenchments were reached it was found that they had been abandoned and presented every evidence of a hasty flight. The Turks had been still more afraid of the Greeks than the Greeks of the Turks. It was simply a question of which force would run first.

We are afraid that this fairly represents last week's situation between the Lords and the Commons, with the Lords as the Greeks and the Commons, we grieve to say, as the Turks. The Lords converted the measure from an Eight Hours to an Eight-and-a-Half Hours Bill, and also postponed its final operation for eighteen months. When it returned to the Commons, Mr. Gladstone, "with great regret," moved to accept the first of these amendments. Mr. Keir Hardie said, we believe with perfect truth, that if the Government had adhered to the five years' limit for the exclusion of the two windings, the Lords would have given way, and that no effective attempt had been made to save the Bill from mutilation. The miners, finding that the Government would not fight, also yielded. Mr. Ponsonby alone struck the true Radical note, complaining that the Liberal Government had begun their campaign against the House of Lords on their knees. Lord Robert Cecil satirically asked Mr. Ponsonby whether he really supposed that the Government were going to fight the House of Lords, or to do anything against them which compromised the term of their own life.

We rejoice to note the volume of evidence which shows that native Indian opinion warmly accepts Lord

Morley's Indian scheme, and is prepared to work it, and that the Indian Civil Service also approves it. This is by far the most important and welcome news which has reached this country from India since the beginning of the Nationalists' agitation. The Moderate leaders speak of the measure with enthusiasm, and the ex-President of their Congress declares that India may expect no reform so large within the next twenty years. The "Times" correspondent says, indeed, that a discordant note must be expected from Bengal, and adds that leading Bengalese regard it as "a really generous concession of new powers." It is thought that the setting up of an Executive Council for Bengal may lead to a modification of the partition, which the "Manchester Guardian" suggests may come through the raising of Bengal to the status of a Presidency, the subordinate units being governed by members of the Council.

President Castro's curious retirement to Europe has had its not unexpected result. General Gomez, the Vice-President, formerly a strong partisan, has taken advantage of his discovery of a "plot" against his life, in which he implicates Castro and his brother, to displace all the Castro following from the Cabinet, and practically to proclaim himself President. The basis of the coup d'état is, of course, the hostilities with Holland, and the general state of undeclared war with the United States and European Powers. No man but Castro could have sustained a kind of life comparable to that of the Sicilian brigand who retires to his fastness when the powers that be assail him. With Gomez in power, Venezuela's relations with the Powers will become normal.

In the last hours of the Session the Government accepted at the hands of Lord Robert Cecil a Bill for the Protection of Public Meetings. This measure inflicts a fine of £5, or a month's imprisonment, on any person who disturbs a public meeting with a view to stopping its business, or incites another person to commit this offence. A certain measure of Radical criticism was directed against the Bill, which is, of course, aimed at one side of the "suffragettes'" agitation, and will, if it is ignored, lead to wholesale convictions and imprisonments of disturbers. One member thought it would kill "heckling," another that it would take away the "salt" of public meetings, namely, pointed interruptions and "snapshot" criticisms from the audience. It was also thought that organisers of meetings ought to provide their own plans of dealing with interrupters. But on the whole we think the case for protecting the right of public meeting is a strong one, though we wish a more considered remedy had been provided. As for the suffragettes, they are feeling the accustomed reaction of violence in politics.

The Government have appointed a strong Royal Commission, with Lord Richard Cavendish as Chairman, and including two able Civil Servants, Sir Courtenay Ilbert and Sir Francis Hopwood, in order to examine the "various schemes which have been adopted or proposed in order to secure a fully representative character for popularly elected bodies." This, no doubt, covers an inquiry into proportional representation, the second ballot, and the alternative vote—all of them methods either for preventing minorities from claiming representation due to majorities, or of giving majorities no more than their proportional value in the representative assembly. We doubt whether proportional representation is quite ripe, or whether the British electorate is educated up to it. But we hope the Commission will be able to report on such comparatively simple changes as the second ballot.

The Executive of the Preston Liberal Association have decided not to support Mr. Harold Cox as a regular Liberal candidate, but to allow the Liberal organisation to help him as an "independent Free Trade candidate." We are glad to note this sensible decision, and we hope it will secure Mr. Cox's return. Mr. Cox is not a modern Liberal or Radical. He is an exponent of pure laissez faire, and from this point of view he is an invaluable critical element in the too thin and sluggish intellectual life of the House of Commons, forcing men to think and the exponents of new ideas to define them with care. It is interesting to see that the hard and fast party system permits the return of so detached a critic, and even gives promise of his re-election.

The decision to issue a Russian loan of £45,000,000, which the Council of the Empire adopted last week, probably means that there will be no war in the Near East. Europe, as M. Hanotaux cynically suggests, will again "buy her peace," insuring herself against an Austro-Russian war by giving Russia what she wants. Meanwhile, the Austrian terms of settlement with Turkey have been published in the "Neue Freie Presse." They offer concessions in regard to the Customs Duties, concede monopolies, and propose other terms which Austria cannot grant without the consent of the Powers. But they do not contain any direct proposal of compensation for the loss of Bosnia-Herzegovina, still less the £4,000,000 which Turkey wants.

A group of the leading Persian clerics and notables have addressed a petition to the Parliaments of Europe praying that "the Parliaments which have grown out of the desires of the nations for Liberty will help them to win back that Liberty which has been so treacherously taken from them," and vigorously protesting against the action "organised by violence, and inspired by interested courtiers," which has practically revoked the Constitution. The general situation is critical. The Teheran correspondent of the "Ryech" telegraphs that the Shah is nervous, and is trying to secure his position by lavish presents to his courtiers and body-guard. Refugees in large numbers have fled to the Legations, but soldiers have been posted at the entrances to the Turkish Embassy, where there are 150 refugees, with the object of prohibiting fresh arrivals from entering and also of cutting off supplies. The correspondent of the "Ryech" further states that the contract for the appointment of Russian instructors to the Cossack Brigade, which is on the point of expiring, will be renewed for another twelve years, and the number of Russian officers raised.

Our Paris correspondent writes:—"The Unified Socialists gained two significant victories in the bye-elections at Charolles and Villefranche last Sunday. At Charolles, where a vacancy was caused by the election to the Senate of M. Sarrien, the predecessor of M. Clémenceau in the premiership, M. Sarrien's son was defeated by a majority of 1,482. At Villefranche, where the seat had also been previously held by a Radical, the Socialist majority was 550. The constituencies are representative ones. Charolles is an agricultural district in Saône-et-Loire; Villefranche is a mining district in Aveyron. It is impossible to avoid the conclusion that the tenderness of the Clemenceau Ministry for the Conservative bourgeoisie is becoming distasteful both to workmen and to peasant proprietors. Some of the Ministerial organs assert that the Socialist successes are due to reactionary support, and M. Cabrol, the successful candidate, at Villefranche, is accused of having made overtures to the clericals."

"I AM assured that the latter accusation is entirely without foundation, and the former statement will not hold water when one compares the figures with those of the same constituencies at the General Election of 1906. At Charolles the Socialist vote has increased from 1,837 to 6,841, and the Radical vote has declined from 11,920 to 5,369. At Villefranche the Socialist vote has increased from 1,836 to 7,521, and the Radical vote has declined from 9,980 to 6,971. It is, therefore, clear that the Socialist-Radicals opposed to certain tendencies of the present Government have either voted for the Socialist candidate or abstained, and that they form a large section—at Charolles more than half—of the Radical electorate. These elections confirm the opinion which I expressed in THE NATION that the decisions of the Socialist Congress at Toulouse would have a salutary effect on the fortunes of the party. There can be no doubt that the action of that Congress, in repudiating Hervéism and anarchism, in refusing to excommunicate independent members of the party, and in holding out the olive branch to the Socialist-Radicals, has regained for the Socialist Party the confidence that it was rapidly losing. The manifesto-resolution of the Congress was approved on Sunday by the Socialist Federation of the Seine—one of the most advanced—by 257 votes against 32 and 18 abstentions, although the Federation, rather inconsistently, carried by substantial majorities resolutions regretting the refusal of the Congress to expel M. Marius André from the Executive and Messieurs Brousse, Breton, and Heppenheimer from the party."

AN epidemic of passionate crimes, more in character with Southern Italy than with our more easily controlled people, seems to be running through the country. At Maldon, a quiet old-fashioned Essex town, a young man named Cole, as the result of a family quarrel with an eccentric father, killed the old man, his brother-in-law, and, finally, himself. Following on the agreed suicide of a couple, a married man and his lover, at a Brighton hotel, we have a similar crime, probably of imitation, in a carriage of the Southampton express. A young married man shot a girl, for whom he had formed an attachment, and then killed himself. Letters in the two last cases showed that these love affairs had aroused a vehemence of feeling in character with their tragic ends.

DR. PAGET, who exchanges the Suffragan Bishopric of Ipswich for that of Stepney, has served for more than a quarter of a century as a London clergyman, and proved himself a capable organiser and an acceptable, if not quite a brilliant, preacher. He is a High Churchman of the moderate type, and his appointment to succeed Dr. Lang maintains the balance of parties among the London bishops. The position of a Suffragan Bishop is not usually one of weight or leadership, and little fault can be found with Dr. Paget's selection. None the less, Liberal Churchmen will regret that advantage was not taken of the opportunity to select a man who would be something more than a successful chairman and organiser. The canonry at St. Paul's, from which the Bishop of Stepney's salary comes, is in the gift of the Crown, but the advice of the Bishop of London is naturally a weighty factor in selecting the London suffragans, so that a thoroughly progressive appointment could hardly be expected.

THE report of the Army Qualifying Board on the work of the candidates for the Army examined last September gives a remarkable view of the average intellectual quality of our officers. Here are some of the extracts:—

> Dictation . . . uneven; some of the candidates made the most grotesque mistakes both in orthography and in punctuation; others lost marks by pure carelessness and inattention.
> The précis-writing was in most cases unequivocally bad. . . . The vital defects were recklessness in misstatement and an apparent inability of the writers to read a simple narration with any degree of care and intelligence.
> The results of the examination in geometry were very poor indeed.
> There is still an unduly large proportion of candidate who know practically nothing of geography.
> A lamentable ignorance of sound elementary knowledge of French was shown.
> Of the ten candidates offering German not one was really good, and some were very bad.
> Only a small proportion of the candidates in Latin are safe from making blunders of the most elementary description.
> The one candidate in Greek sent up half a dozen words of no value.

We thought that Mr. Haldane and the London School of Economics had introduced a keener intellectual spirit into the Army, but a report of this kind gives a very low view of the educational standards and the personal interests of a section of our governing classes. We are afraid that no European, perhaps no civilised, nation could exhibit such a wide area of sheer indifference to knowledge of all kinds among young men who, after all, have to think out some rather tough mental problems.

MR. ROBERT HARCOURT has issued a Bill proposing to abolish the censorship of plays, substituting the London County Council for the Lord Chamberlain and Mr. Redford, as the licensing and controlling authority, and unifying the supervision of the theatres and of the music halls. We do not see how any moralist or friend and student of the drama can object to these changes, and we cannot but hope that the Government will look favorably upon them. The Lord Chamberlain's authority does not keep the theatre either decent or moral; it does bind it to triviality, frivolousness, the beauty show; it does unduly favor the purely commercial drama; and it does exclude serious criticism of life, suited to our age, as Molière's art was suited to his. All that is wanted is the general sense of the community, with the police at the background, to stop sheer licence. Mr. Harcourt's plan provides these safeguards.

Politics and Affairs.

THE CHARACTER OF PARTIES.

Observers of politics will, we think, feel that with the close of the long Parliamentary year of 1908 we enter on a period of much doubt and perplexity in our public affairs. We deal elsewhere with the special issue of the Lords, and, indeed, it is impossible to separate it from any consideration of the future of British parties. No fair observer will fail to recognise the evidence of zeal and public spirit, of consideration for the evils and disabilities of modern existence, which marks this Administration and its chief, as compared with the coldness of view, the slackness and want of energy, of the declining Unionist Government it replaced. Mr. Balfour, with all his satirical insight into the working of the Parliamentary machine, seemed to see nothing and care for nothing in the larger operations of the national life, economic and social. This is greatly changed. Nearly all the public departments, charged as they have been with the listlessness born of long inertia under Tory rule, have been driven into fresh activity. Both Mr. Asquith and his predecessor have been lavish of their time, as far as the hearing of public grievances has been concerned. Old commercial and administrative problems, such as the re-organisation of Irish Education or the restoration of the Port of London, have been solved. Both to India and to South Africa, the Liberal remedy of representative institutions has been applied, and not in vain. We all know that honest attempts are being made to think out the two riddles of the Sphinx in modern industrialism, unemployment or slack employment, and the penury of old age and premature decay. Goodwill is not wanting to our present governors, nor feeling, nor executive ability; and, on its side, the nation has no interest, like the unhappy African adventure, which competes with the demands of the social question. We grant all this, and yet who can compare the fruits of the Session, with its four first-class measures—the Irish Education Act, the Miners Act, the Pensions Act, the Port of London Act—with the work of Liberalism in its golden prime during the first Gladstonian Administration? Even when we come to the second-rate schemes, and take a measure like the Children's Bill, we see the failure to attack a great problem like child-trading comparing significantly with the triviality of the assault on such evils as child-smoking. Here, no doubt, we come at once on the paralysing effect of the Lords on all the larger and distinctively Liberal activities of the Government. None of these measures, large or small, raised issues which a Chamberlain, as opposed to a Balfour, Administration, could not have closed. Only two of them represent the direct attack of the great reforming engine created in 1906 on the special obstacles to democracy against which it moved. The need of the party, therefore, is to seek afresh the sources of its power: to go to the people who gave it its mandate, to interest them in the great and simple things of politics, to co-ordinate its smaller practical devices with large ideas and principles of action. All the great chiefs of Liberalism of the older school—Cobden, Bright, Gladstone—possessed this gift; and Lord Morley used to cultivate it. For the moment the issue is to create a powerful combative force, and to give it a morally impressive and intellectually persuasive, as well as brilliant, expression. Who will do this? Who is able to do it? And who will initiate the necessary work of setting up the body of sympathetic but clearly and firmly expressed Radical criticism which is wanting to this Parliament, though it never failed the greatest of Liberal Administrations?

This absence of voice in our political leaders is not at all confined to the Liberal Party. It is even more conspicuous in the Labor ranks. With the exception of Mr. Keir Hardie, the representatives of the new labor movement are less truly eloquent than the older body of trade unionists, speaking through men like Mr. Burt. And they are not more self-reliant. They hardly seem to think it part of their business to enter fully into the problems of statesmanship. On foreign affairs they follow the Liberal lead, and often do well to take such guidance; and even when a special industrial problem, such as old age pensions, arises, consider themselves absolved from contributing to the discussion of its finance. The Liberals were to find both the scheme and the money; Labor simply made its demand and let the Liberal Government think out its practical application. The impatient section, led by Mr. Grayson and Mr. Blatchford, does not better this attitude of intellectual passivity; on the contrary, it emphasises it by acknowledging no responsibility, even for its rhetoric. Therefore, all the good qualities of the Labor Party, the personal probity of its members, their industry, good feeling, and real moderation, give them only a secondary part even in the shaping of Ministerial policy. Probably the new disability which the law places on their finance will force them to take a more definite position, and to give a more reasoned account of it.

But, after all, the limitations of Labor and Liberalism are less conspicuous than the death-in-life which has overtaken Parliamentary Conservatism. If ideas, and the clear and powerful expression of ideas, are somewhat lacking to the progressive parties, even the desire to think and feel in terms of modern existence seems to have abandoned the Tories under their present chief. Not one contribution, save that of mere ingenuity of mind bent on small victories of tactics, has Mr. Balfour made to the work of the Session. He is a pure critic, dealing in words, the counters of things, rather than in realities. And it is here that we divine the manifest embarrassment of the bolder and more convinced Protectionists, who are determined to form both the personnel and the policy of the next Tory Government. How can they give a plausible air of democracy to an Administration captained by the author of the speech on the third reading of the Miners' Act, a speech no more and no less relevant to an Eight Hours Bill than to the Ten Hours Act? How can they hope to get over the initial difficulty that Protection presents to a nation like ours—namely, that it proposes to raise the cost of living to the mass of people living habitually close to the margin of subsistence—when their chief sets himself against the network of counter-vailing Protection for Labor, which, delusive as it would be against the great robbery of Protection, is their only chance of overcoming its fear of the taxation of food? Such a position is plainly untenable. Bismarckianism without compensations, Conscription, Protection for the capitalist and landlord alone, High Toryism based on the Church and the Bottle, legislative Nihilism in all the departments save the tax-gatherer's—what a prospect is this! Even the foes of Liberalism and Labor admit that they are alive; that they have within themselves the seeds of future activity and development. But Mr. Balfour's Toryism is dead; and what men witness and admire in him on the floor of the House of Commons is not an activity of statesmanship so much as the spirit of caste, an intellectual exclusiveness for which, with all its refinements, the modern State has no use.

A BAD BEGINNING WITH THE LORDS.

We hope that the action of the Government on the Miners Bill is not to be taken as a specimen of their method of conducting a spirited fight with the House of Lords. Here is a Bill which has been promoted by the greatest trade union in the country for, we are afraid to say how many, years. Its principle has been repeatedly affirmed by majorities in the House of Commons. At length it is pushed through, and, emerging from Committee and Report in a very moderate form, is presented to the House of Lords, which, so far as it considers anything so base as coal, condescends to represent the interest of coal owners. It reaches the Lords in the very middle of an alleged crisis. A great battle, we have just been informed, is about to be fought. The power of the House of Lords to defy the representatives of the people has gone unchallenged too long. It has produced grave disorder in the Constitution. It has become the dominant issue, to which everything else must give way. The Lords, having possibly heard something of the same sort before, proceed very deliberately, and without the least consciousness of the crisis, to amend the Bill. Substantially they change it into an 8½ hours Bill, and as such it returns to a House of Commons that is thirsting, if we are to believe political speeches, for the fray. Here, then, we all suppose is the opportunity. Here is another insult, a fresh challenge, a most outspoken reply to the threats of a week ago. Our faithful Commons will doubtless take it up and hurl back the defiance of the Peers in their teeth. We shall hear of great things and see noble doings. So the innocent reader of Mr. Asquith's late speech might have supposed. The more experienced politician would have prophesied the contrary. He knows all about the fight. He has heard before about the dominant issue, and he has come to the conclusion that the more it is talked about the less real it becomes. In vain did Mr. Arthur Ponsonby press for action. In vain did he urge the unanswerable argument that to accept the amendment was to give first blood to the Lords. He has got to inoculate his leaders with something of the fighting spirit. Some of them, we fear, have to be taught the elementary conditions of a fighting policy.

Indeed, a simpler issue, yielding more readily to average management and steadfastness, could not have been imagined. We assert, without any fear of contradiction, that the Lords were actually prepared to give way, and expected the Commons to call on them to do so. They recognised that their leaders had gone too far, and that Lord Lansdowne's astute policy of excepting Labor Bills from the general operations of the war on Liberalism was being compromised. They were, indeed, prepared to evacuate their camp the moment they discovered a forward movement in the enemy's lines. Unfortunately, it was the Commons who fled first, leaving the army in possession which had already shouldered its luggage for the retreat. "We are in a great difficulty," said one of the peers. "The Commons want to force us into rejecting a Bill, which we want to save. It seems to me we shall have to drop our amendments." Why the Government did not even test the fighting capacity of its foe passes our imagination. There was no necessity to drop the Bill. The Lords' amendments could have been knocked out twice, and the Bill sent up to them, and behind such a strong tactical movement would have lain the anger and resolution of a majority bent on vindicating the Constitution and on satisfying a powerful and well-organised body of working-class opinion. But if the Government was weak, what are we to say of the Labor Party? Did the workmen of Great Britain despatch a body of fifty members of Parliament to yield to the House of Lords a point of this magnitude without even a struggle to retain it? All we can say is that a party so spiritless has no ground of quarrel with Liberalism, and no right to complain if in future the House of Lords qualifies its respect for Labor Bills with the shrewd calculation that the party behind them may, with a trifling display of tactics, be "bluffed" into an easy surrender.

In view, therefore, of the untimely weakness shown by the Progressive army in both its divisions it is necessary to ask whether the question of the House of Lords has really become the dominant issue? If not, let us have no more speeches about it. Let us consider Mr. Asquith's speech unspoken; let us settle down to non-contentious business, and accept the House of Lords as the disposing power in legislation. Let this go down to history as the great constitutional achievement of the huge Liberal majority of 1906. This is one alternative. It ensures to Liberal Ministers and to Liberal and, we must add, Labour Members, the secure and peaceful enjoyment of their temporary but very real vested interest in the life of the present Parliament. It is, however, an alternative resented by many Liberal Members, and it would carry with it the end of Liberalism as a vital force in politics. The other alternative is to take Mr. Asquith's speech as it was spoken, to accept the constitutional issue as dominating all others, or rather absorbing them into itself, and to address the whole strategy of the party from this time forth to securing a victory in the encounter and vindicating anew for the British people the right of self-government in legislation.

Such a struggle is no child's play. It cannot be taken up to-day and laid down to-morrow. It is to be a long encounter, waged under many circumstances of difficulty, with a strongly entrenched foe. It is not to be won by distracting interests, but by concentrating them. It is not to be won by a series of innocent non-contentious measures. The Lords will let these lambkins of legislation prance through their dread portals unharmed. They will merely serve to distract attention from the fight, to allay indignation, and allow the champions of the Peers to point out how reasonable they are when anything really pretty and well-meaning is put before them. Nor, again, will the raising of cross issues that divide opinion and cause fresh cleavages help us in this case. The country would witness with impatience and ridicule the spectacle of the House of Commons gravely sitting down to the academic discussion of a Welsh Disestablishment Bill. How could Ministers introducing such a measure keep their countenance when inviting the House of Commons to play the part of an amateur Parliament for six months? The ultimate fate of such a measure is foreseen from the moment it figures in the King's Speech. Not a debate on it but will be unreal. Not an amendment but will be an added touch to a solemn farce. He who wills the end wills the means. The Welshman who sincerely wants Disestablishment must not dally with a hopeless Bill, but must attack the Lords. The Bills introduced next Session should, in our opinion, be limited to those which strike directly at the political and economic power of the Peers. The Housing Bill, which deals mildly enough with one side of the question, will be re-introduced and passed through the House of Commons under the guillotine. The Scottish Land Bills can be revived, and we would gladly see not only a Land Valuation Bill for England, but an attempt, even at the eleventh hour, to render the Small Holdings Act a more effectual measure than it has yet been. With these measures, a strong Budget, and a Bill dealing directly with the question of the Constitution, our attack will be made in full force.

Thus concentrated it is an attack which will not be altogether easy to meet. We can judge fairly of our potential strength from the attitude of the opposite party. Well aware that the position of the House of Lords once definitely challenged cannot be defended in argument, they begin already to make dispositions for a retreat. The Peers themselves talk of reform. Unionist newspapers mention the Referendum. They have no confidence in their present defenders, and are well aware that the battle will be decided not by the strength of the defences, but according to the measure of resoluteness and sagacity in the attack. For us, unfortunately, it is precisely the question whether these qualities are to animate the counsels of our leaders that remains most uncertain. We are forced for the time to criticise, not the House of Lords itself, but our own champions who hesitate to deliver the attack on it which they have so often announced. A concentration of the issue will convey with it a concentration of Liberal and Radical forces and a revival of life in the party, which counts for more in the winning of battles than all the prudence in "choosing your own ground" and "biding your own time." The Government have abundantly proved their discretion. The time has come for a touch of valor.

LAND VALUES AND THE BUDGET.

During the Parliamentary recess it may be well for politically-minded persons to concentrate attention on the sole piece of constructive work left to this Government, the Budget, as to which Mr. George gave at Liverpool the negative re-assurance that it would not be based on the taxation of the people's food. Mr. Lloyd George's proposals must, from the very nature of the financial situation, be bold, innovating, and productive. Though the position is not so desperate as might appear from the terrifying Christmas card just issued by that faithful guardian of financial virtue, Mr. Gibson Bowles, the necessity of finding many millions of fresh revenue is undeniable. Even Mr. Bowles could not seriously contend that the most stringent enemies of administration, with the strictest methods of accountancy, would enable the Government to conduct the business of the nation without a considerable increase of taxation. Liberal principles demand that this taxation shall be direct, and shall be imposed on forms of property and income that have ability to bear it. It is idle to argue, as does Mr. Bowles, that high graduation will so increase the temptations to evasion among the rich as to make the graded taxes unproductive. This has not in fact resulted from the application of the principle to Death Duties. The weight of evidence does not support his contention that "the number of rich men who divest themselves, in favor of their children, and even of others, of a notable portion of their estates is already great." But if this were the case, it is only another strong argument in favor of grading the income-tax so as to secure in this manner to the Treasury the public revenue which has been surreptitiously withdrawn from the operation of the Estate Duty. Income-Tax and Estate Duty are, in effect, two complementary taxes, and the method of graduation found feasible and productive in the one should be extended to the other, even were needs of revenue less urgent than they are.

While it is, of course, undeniable that graduation has some necessary limits, and that a transgression of these limits would be alike a fruitless fiscal policy and injurious to industry, so long as income and property are known to contain large elements of unearned increment in the shape of rents, high profits, and dividends, there is no reason for such apprehension. No Englishman will remove his capital or his ability from any employment in this country which enables him to obtain a high rate of profit, on account of any sort of tax within the contemplation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

But while general incomes and property must be expected to contribute more largely to the necessities of revenue, we have always urged the separate assessment for taxation of such values as are directly and measurably due to natural scarcity or legal privilege. The income from liquor licenses is an instance upon which we need not dwell, for it may be assumed that a substantial contribution to the public purse from this publicly created revenue is determined. A more difficult issue arises on the policy of an Imperial tax upon land values. While we are not of the school which thinks that the Almighty created the earth with the special purpose of furnishing economic rent as revenue for modern States, the logical case for imposing a specific tax on land values is invincible. Such values are evidently the product of natural scarcity and public needs, and they have complete ability to bear a tax in that taxation will not cause their owners to withdraw the land from use. On the contrary, one of the most urgent pleas for taxing land is that the effect of such a tax, especially if it be accompanied by remission of taxation on improvements, will compel a more socially advantageous use of land. Nor do we find much force in the contention that a tax upon land values is an unjust discrimination against a particular form of investment. Every form of tax is open to the same objection. Its burden falls exclusively and predominantly upon some special property, trade, or class. Moreover, if, as is not unlikely, an Imperial tax on land values is compassed by a reformed use of Schedule A in the existing income-tax, and incomes taxed as land value are not a second time subjected to income-tax, the charge of discrimination loses any sting it might otherwise possess. Finally, it should be borne in mind that the probability of land values being subjected to special taxation has been a matter of so much notoriety that it must be deemed to have been discounted, to some extent, in recent purchases of land and leases.

The real issue, however, is less one of economic theory, or of abstract justice than of immediate policy. Though land values means for practical purposes site values, and these have been earmarked for municipal rather than for imperial revenue, there is much to say at the present time in favor of the priority of taxation over rating. The former can be compassed through the Finance Bill, and a national instrument of land valuation requiring no sanction of the House of Lords will be afterwards available for municipal purposes. For an imperial tax on land values is no poaching upon the municipal preserve. It is simply a step towards that readjustment between national and local finance which is one of the important reforms of the near future.

But, in contemplating a provision of new national income from this source, it is wise to avoid too sanguine expectations. Though landlords often exercise a most oppressive power alike in town and in country, and dramatic instances of enormous rises of ground values can be cited, annual land values in the aggregate constitute a small percentage of the total income of this nation. One of the serious difficulties of the situation is that no even approximate estimate of land values exists. If, however, we take for our best evidence the separate site valuation of London, made fifteen years ago, with due allowance for its recent growth, and apply it with a reasonable deduction to other towns, the annual site values for the United Kingdom would, perhaps, amount to eighty million pounds. As for agricultural land, its "unimproved" value must, during the last thirty years, have sunk to a low figure, and even if recent capital expended on structural improvements were alone taken into account for deduction, the land values remaining for taxation could not amount to many millions. After other items, such as mining and sporting lands, are taken into consideration, it is unlikely that the annual value susceptible to taxation would exceed one hundred and twenty millions, as a somewhat generous estimate. A tax levied either upon this annual value, or upon the capitalised sum it represents, could hardly be imposed so as to make a net yield of more than two or three millions, after allowance was made for existing Imperial burdens upon land. More drastic taxation, though theoretically sound, would be impolitic in view of the wide distribution of tiny landed interests involved in the modern system of investments. The taxation of land values will impart a stiffening to the Budget, and will be an earnest of the new radical finance which shall, in the future, gather for the nation its proper share of the net increase of land values, estimated in the case of the Metropolis alone to amount to a million and a-half per annum. But for the moment the yield of this tax affecting existing values will doubtless be supplementary to the main policy of an extended graduation in the taxation of general income and inheritance.

THE END OF THE MIR.

When the history of the present reaction in Russia is written in the light of the freedom which must ultimately come, it is probable that posterity will judge M. Stolypin's agrarian "reforms" even more severely than his measures of repression. Exile without trial, imprisonment in pestiferous gaols, the anarchy of martial law, even such excesses as the sentencing of 1,600 persons to death by summary military courts in the past eleven months—these things may, in the end, leave behind them as their only permanent legacy a memory and a hatred of despotism which will be the strongest bulwark of freedom. Exiles may return, prisoners may be liberated, and even the dead leave spiritual heirs who will not forget the lesson of their devotion. But an institution once ruined cannot be restored. The destruction of the village community, which can be only a question of time if the Bill now before the Duma should pass into law, deserves to rank among the most wasteful acts of vandalism in history. Other venerable institutions like the medieval guilds have perished partly from internal decay, partly under the pressure of changing economic conditions. But the Russian Mir will have been deliberately and consciously destroyed by the irreverent hand of a bureaucrat with the aid of a packed Chamber of landlords. Nothing marks more clearly the decadence of Russian Nationalism. A generation ago it was, at least, a party of ideas. Its leaders were thinkers who had adapted to their own uses the more reactionary of Hegel's theses. They believed in some special destiny for the Slav races, who were to carry in the face of the industrial and unbelieving West, the three principles of autocracy, ortho-doxy, and the village community. This party has on its conscience wars and repressions and persecutions, but it brought about the emancipation of the serfs, and, at its best, it opposed the selfishness of the great landowners and the encroachments of the new bureaucracy. Above all, it kept alive a romantic and idealistic view of life, which was as superior to the brutal materialism of the present bureaucracy, as the humanitarian and Christian Toryism of Mid-Victorian England was superior to the state of a mind of a contemporary London Moderate. This mystical Russian Nationalism has degenerated to-day into the epileptic violence of the Black Hundreds. The ruling classes, on the other hand, are fighting not for ideas at all, but simply for the preservation of their great estates and their arbitrary power.

A vast deal of romantic history and fanciful ethnography went to the making of the Slavophil legend of the Mir. It was hailed as a prehistoric institution, an original possession of the Slav races, if not, indeed, of the whole Indo-European group. Its survival unchanged was held to prove at once the conservatism and the brotherly social instincts of the Slavs. Exacter inquiry has proved it to be something much more interesting than a survival. It is a growth which has arisen as a solution of certain problems, and the action of the external forces which produced it can be traced so late as the fourteenth, and even eighteenth, centuries. The State helped to create it because it was more convenient in collecting taxes to deal with a single community than with individual peasants. The landowner also played his part. As it exists to-day the Mir is a democratic organism with elected chiefs, which administers its own customary law, assesses the share of each family in the collective tax imposed on the village as a whole, and controls the common land in the interests of every native of the village, absent or present. The pasture land is held and used in common. The arable land is commonly redistributed every twelve years among the families of the village. The principle of distribution is to allot to each a proportion suited to the number of its workers and their needs. The widow and the orphan can never lose their share, and even the laborer who emigrates to a town retains his rights and his duties in the Mir. It is a system which prevents the growth of a landless proletariat, and dispenses with the need of a poor-law. If these villages do not thrive there is no need to turn to the Mir for an explanation. It has not land enough to make for each family an economic holding, and at the emancipation the nobles usually contrived to keep the best fields for themselves. The State has done little for education, and the peasants are too primitive and too ignorant to understand any but the modest and most wasteful culture. The rural prefects created in 1890 have revived some of the grosser evils of serfdom, though they are nominally bureaucrats rather than landlords. The destruction of forests and the absence of irrigation has made famine chronic. The tax-gatherer and the usurer between them have crushed and enslaved the peasants. But there are undoubtedly blots on the system on which an economist can fasten. He complains, with some reason, that it does not encourage private initiative, and it is probably true that a peasant tends to neglect his fields as the period of redistribution approaches. With absolute ownership he would have security for his improvements. On the other hand, the Constitutional Democrats point out that the real obstacle to private enterprise is rather the difficulty of renting additional land, for which the landlords, under the pressure of an ever-growing demand, exact grotesquely uneconomic rents. Hence their policy of expropriating the great landlords, a policy which probably did more to set the landed and official classes against them than all their demands for civil liberties and ministerial responsibilty.

The Bill on which M. Stolypin is staking his position, in face of a divided and reluctant Duma, is much overdue. Its essential provisions were promulgated by ukase after the dissolution of the first Duma in November, 1906. In accordance with the constitution—if we may speak of a constitution in Russia—it ought to have been accepted within three months by the Duma. But such minor irregularities are trifling in comparison with the larger irregularities which M. Stolypin has perpetrated. The Bill authorises any member of a Mir to claim the lot which he cultivates as his personal property, and by so doing to leave the Mir of which he is a member. The intention of this measure is to destroy an institution in which one school of Russian Socialists has always seen a nucleus of communism, and at the same time to create a class of peasant owners who will be a barrier against revolution. In practice it will probably have a quite contrary effect. The peasant who claims his allotment will usually do so under the pressure of debt, and it is the local usurer or drink-seller who will be its eventual proprietor. The peasant will become a landless laborer, and whether he remains on the soil or drifts permanently to the factories and the towns, he will lose his "stake in the country." It is not at all surprising that the Marxist Social Democrats regard the destruction of the Mir as a preparation for a class war and a proletarian revolution. To the foreign observer, above all to an English observer, this proposal to destroy an institution which kept the peasant on the land, and provided for the orphan and widow, seems merely an insensate wrecking of a system rich in latent possibilities. It is folly to destroy a habit of co-operation and a social sense which have been the slow growth of centuries. Under favorable conditions with the aid of an enlightened teacher the Mir becomes nothing less than a co-operative community, which owns machines jointly and even attempts intensive culture. If such instances are rare, it is only because the Government has persecuted the men who would naturally be the leaders and the teachers of the pesantry. The system lends itself to endless experiments and reforms. To destroy it is to create all the miseries of exploitation by usurers and petty landlords. More land, more education, and, above all, more liberty, are the real remedies for the poverty of the Russian village. To throw the peasant on his own resources, to rob him of an institution which has been his providence for generations, is simply to expose him to helpless dependence, and to carry into the villages the class-war which rages already in the towns.

SOME IMPRESSIONS OF THE SESSION.

Most Sessions of Parliament have a way of concluding with some undesigned piece of symbolism, and it will have been observed by the discerning in such matters that on what was supposed to be the last effective day of the Session of 1908 Mr. Crooks, playing the part of a propitious deity, contrived to bring down the curtain on a mock motion for the abolition of the hereditary principle. Unfortunately, the effect was rehearsed, whereas it happens to be of the essence of this occult art that its manifestations should be accidental. Sure enough, we had the real thing in the epilogue of last Monday, when the last spontaneous word addressed to a Minister took the form of a question abruptly truncated by a summons to the other House. Thus, with singular appropriateness, the Session ended, after all, on a half-formulated note of interrogation, with the House of Lords blindly thrusting itself into the ellipsis.

In some interim notes on the progress of the Session, written last August, I ventured to catalogue among the traits of this Parliament a habit of living in the future. It is a habit that persists. "Man never is but always to be blest," and so also with many politicians, the destined goal is certain to be reached next Session, or the Session after that, or at any rate in the last Session of all. Nevertheless it has to be noted as a fresh and general tendency of recent months that the opposing camps have at last begun to concentrate within their fighting lines. Half-way through the Session it was said of the Unionists that their divisions remained unhealed and that apart from some new developments in reaction no change had occurred in their political basis. If the process may be so described the reaction has continued to advance. With a steadily gathering momentum the Opposition have kept swinging round from the democratised Toryism of the Chamberlain school to the cherished Balfourian ideal of a mixed oligarchy of wealth, territorial power, and high clericalism. Strange to say, although the party becomes more, rather than less, infatuated with the one surviving article of Mr. Chamberlain's later creed, much of this general retrogression—the hostility to temperance reform, to the Eight Hours Bill, to Old Age Pensions, and so forth—has been inspired by the fighting tactics of its diminishing Free Trade group, notably by Lord Robert Cecil. Under such unexpected auspices is Toryism in Parliament retracing its steps towards a precarious reunion!

While Unionism is thus drawing together as with an instinctive sense of the coming clash of battle, the Progressive forces, too, appear to be getting ready to cast down the more artificial of their partitions. Of course, different impressions are produced on different minds by the same set of phenomena. For instance, the "Times" detects in the increased co-operation between Labor and Liberal-Labor members a sign of widening divergence between Labor and Liberalism generally. For my part, I should say, from the evidence of the last few months, that if the closer association of the two groups has had any influence at all on the more extended relationship of parties, the effect has rather been to re-create a connecting link of sympathy between Labor and Liberalism, to give the strengthened group a higher sense of responsibility, and to transform it from a merely or mainly critical and rather crotchety human apparatus into an instrument with a practical and clearly defined constructive aim. After all, when we have a Labor member, in the name of practical politics, standing up for the Government in a bargain with the House of Lords, and this, too, against the censure of a Ministerialist, the true inference would seem to be that the events of the Session have tended not to widen but to narrow differences between the two wings. Again, Mr. Snowden's recent tribute to the political honesty of Mr. Asquith, or, indeed, to any Liberal statesman, would have been almost inconceivable down to as late a period as six months ago.

Are these incidents and tendencies, one asks, the signs merely of an awakening instinct of political self-preservation? Ought we to discern in them the shadow of some imminent event? Or are they the fruits of a wise and prosperous generalship? I think it would be unjust and short-sighted not to concede to both leaders—to Mr. Balfour as well as to Mr. Asquith—a very considerable share of credit for the increased cohesion of their respective forces. Naturally, Mr. Balfour's has been the easier task. On his own side he is a Triton among the minnows, so sure either of his superior intellectual suppleness, or of the mental poverty of most of those by whom he is surrounded, that he can successfully challenge their obedient applause, even in flouting their convictions. The truth is that, in one sense, Mr. Balfour and his party now thoroughly understand, even though they may still distrust, each other. At the present moment Toryism in the Commons has no possible alternative leader, not even a possible deputy leader, and everybody knows it—especially, let it be owned, Mr. Balfour and his sorely criticised lieutenants

In Mr. Asquith's case, on the other hand, such successes as have been achieved by his leadership, notably the remarkable solidarity of the Progressive forces throughout the storm and stress of the Licensing Bill controversy, have been due to the self-possession and force with which he has led and won the confidence of men with talents scarcely less brilliant than his own, and with views of policy certainly not less strongly held. For the rest the session closes with all eyes fixed in expectant hope on the statesman whose opportunity, it is felt, must either be grasped in the session to come, or lost for ever. At any rate that is one of the impressions left by the session, and indeed by the Prime Minister's virile management of the bulk of its affairs. Most Members believe, with Mr. Snowden, that "he means business and has ideas and plans."

CHRISTMAS AND CHARITY.

The ideal picture of an English Christmas besets the imagination with a force that defies all contrary experience. The snow-covered roofs, the laden trees where the red holly-berries shine amid the dazzling white, the robin fluttering about the window-sill for the crumbs that the children throw out, the keen frosty air, the skating, and the return to the blazing fire and good cheer—the bright picture still holds its own in the stories and the Christmas cards, and in the phrase "an old-fashioned Christmas." It survives the recurrence of one mild and muggy December after another, and is quite sufficiently nourished, if it requires nourishment at all, by a single Christmas snowstorm in ten years. In the teeth of experience, we still believe that the typical Christmas is of the kind which Mr. Pickwick enjoyed at Dingley Dell, when the party were glad to gather round the blazing log-fire, and draw closer and more cosily together as they heard the wind rumble in the chimney, and knew that the snow was growing into deep drifts round the house. We feel a vested right in the Dickensian Christmas, and, in spite of meteorology, feel ourselves regularly defrauded as the season comes round, and we wake to grey, leaden skies, or to mild, spring-like sunshine.

All the parts of the old Christmas tradition hang together. The driving snow or the cold, sharp frost made the fire seem brighter and the welcome warmer to benumbed and weary travellers rejoining the family circle. Good cheer within was all the better for the sense of cold and storm defied and overcome, and the cream of it all was the stimulated sense of sharing with the poor and needy which belonged to the sentiment of the season. The old-fashioned charity was, and still in a measure is, an integral part of the old-fashioned Christmas. For charity, too, has fallen on evil days. The "waits" and mummers and carol singers that were a real charm in the monotony of the old village life have become under conditions of town and suburb little better than an organised nuisance, and the gifts that they demand and generally receive are a compound of the charity of the season with a mild but pervasive form of blackmail. Policemen, postmen, dustmen, railway signalmen, platelayers, choir boys, unemployed, tradesmen's men, all in turn appear at the door with pencilled lists in which it is proved to Mrs. Brown that she must give 2s. 6d. from the fact that Mrs. Jones has already given 2s. Concert tickets, entertainments, various charitable objects afford a pretext, but Mrs. Brown does not go into nice questions of the precise destination of her money. All she asks is for how little she can close the transaction without appearing mean. Meanwhile she has also her really spontaneous charities to consider, the sick woman, or the out-of-work, the once comfortable home where for the moment the most poignant grief of the mother is that she has not only no Christmas dinner, but not a penny or a toy to put into the children's stocking. In defiance of the Charity Organisation Society and of all considerations of wise and properly adjusted philanthropy, Mrs. Brown was determined to supply a pudding for their dinner and a toy for the stockings, and the half-a-crown exaction annoys her all the more.

Perhaps after all she is right. It is only once a year, and as many primitive peoples let go the rigid standard of early social custom and relapsed into the orgies of a general saturnalia at times of high festival, so the impulse to give may be allowed for one week in the year to run riot, and the stern disciplinarians of the poor may be content with their supremacy in the remaining fifty-one. For, after all, this impulse to share the good things of life lies very close to the root of all that goes to make life, we will not say better, but merely endurable. If it were never indulged save with all the restraints with which wisdom would hedge it round, perhaps it would be simply atrophied for want of use. The Lady Bountiful and Mr. Scrooge are like abstractions, and rather thin abstractions too, but if one type is to disappear completely, we had rather it were that of Scrooge. The defect of the Christmas spirit is not so much that it gushes unchecked for one day in a year as that it is not diffused over the dealings of the other 364. It needs not to be dammed up for ever, but to be canalised and distributed in an irrigating stream of a genuine sense of fellowship pervading all the social relations, and losing in its more even flow the dross of patronage and self-satisfaction that it washes down with it from above.

The impulse to give, to succour and relieve is no high product of civilisation. It lies deep down in the fundamental instincts of humanity. It is found widespread in the savage world, and is incorporated as a religious duty in his most ancient religions. Two thousand years and more before the time of Christ the soul of the deceased Egyptian, when he stood up for judgment before the tribunal of Osiris in the Hall of Maati, was made to plead: "I have given food to the hungry, and drink to the thirsting, and clothing to the naked." Benevolence was then, as it was thousands of years later in Europe, a means of acquiring merit and ensuring salvation. It was but too cheap a means. To give is the easiest of the virtues. Apparently an exercise of pure benevolence, it is sometimes palpably and sometimes more subtly linked with the egotism of the giver; and though we no longer expect to purchase eternal immunities by a charitable disposal of worldly goods, we still find in the part of the dispenser of charity sympathy, and advice, refuge from our troubles and escape from the emptiness or meaningless isolation of our own lives, an easy exercise of power, and sometimes a direct ministration to our own vanity. The fashionable woman who puts on her gorgeous attire to go to "her" ward or "her" slum exhibits the blend of feelings in a way to appeal to the humorist. She is so sure that it is a real pleasure to the poor things to see a pretty dress for once, so clear, if anyone were impolite enough to raise the suggestion, that the gaping admiration of such negligible personalities could not minister in the slightest to her own vanity, so unaffected by the poignancy of the contrast between rags and furs that strikes the satirist himself dumb with the sense of pathos.

There has been some discussion in our correspondence columns of late on the function of charity and "personal service." To us it is abundantly clear, first, that the realities of these virtues and duties are to be found not where superiors unbend and condescend to them of low estate, but in the interchange of service and the play of kindly feeling among friends and neighbors and equals. True charity was something added to "brotherly kindness," a spirit which makes receiving and giving alike intrinsically beautiful and desirable. Mrs. Brown does quite right to fill the poor child's stocking, but she accumulates more merit if she accepts a little gift, say, from one of her "foes-in-law," in the spirit of the season. We recognise, further, that it must needs be that gifts should be made and services done to those who cannot return them, that the rich owe a personal duty to the poor, and that care of system and personal trouble are required of them to make their gifts of value. It must needs be that "charity" and its dread "organisation" should remain in a world which repudiates justice. We do not understand anyone to dispute these platitudes. But what many people do realise is that beneficence is not justice, and may be made a fatal enemy to justice. Refusing men their rights of gold, we may dole them out silver from our purses, and bid them be thankful, and count it all as free gifts. We may make our own generosity a plea for the postponement of large organic social changes which would destroy our position as benefactors and turn us into fellow-citizens. This is the gist of the complaint against modern philanthropy, and it is not always without justification. The last and most delicate service that the poor do to the rich is to serve as objects of their beneficence. When they have made the great financier's pile, the "widows and orphans" will serve him doubly, as a political argument against the legislation that would restrict his pile-making, and as a practical object on which to exercise his social virtues. From these refinements of philanthropy we return with relief to Mrs. Brown carrying off her plum pudding and her toy to the back street, and hastily crossing the road when she sees the secretary of the local C.O.S. approaching. But Mrs. Brown herself when Christmas week is over must admit that her philanthrophy must be "organised," and that if she really wants to relieve suffering she must, as in other matters, adapt means to ends. May she have all success! But should she in the coming year realise her ambition and obtain a vote, we hope that, as a citizen, she will place justice before philanthropy, that she will estimate her own efforts at their true worth as personal, individual attempts to undo little items of suffering, and that she will realise that the greatest act of beneficence is to help in making this particular kind of beneficence unnecessary.

WHAT THE AGE LOOKS LIKE.

What will the future make of the present? That is a question which offers a wide field for speculation. There is difficulty in two directions: the imperfection of to-day's record, in its distortions or exaggerations of the life of to-day; and the inadequacy of the life of to-day, even if accurately delineated, to picture its own experience, when set in historic background. The reconstruction of the past has been largely effected through the testimony of contemporary documents: yet with all the material at our disposal, the vision of it is still fluctuating and changing; varying in the estimate of individuals and from decade to decade. To some the days of declining Rome represented a period of tranquillity and human enjoyment; to others they appear as a tremendous warning of the triumph of the deadly sins. The Middle Age stands for one set of historians as a period of gold and innocence; with stately purposes, solemn processions, and widely diffused if frugal comfort, the whole illuminated by great dreams of adventure and aspiration. To others it presents itself as a prolonged delirium in which men wrestled in the darkness with fear and torment. We, perhaps too complacently, assume to-day that history will sharply distinguish our particular period of security from such troublous upheavals of Birth or of Death. We see ourselves painted as a civilisation in the vigor of early manhood, with contentment still charged with ambition, a race in England and Europe full of energy and of purpose, in which life, for the general, has become more tolerable then ever before. We would confess that we had not been able to "still the old sob of the sea," or compel Time to stand still in his courses, or abolish altogether those "two black birds of night," sighing and sorrow. But we would show a people laboring and enjoying, more secure from plague, pestilence, and famine than in former days, so accustomed to carry out unimpeded the labors of the day as almost to have forgotten the experience of a time when life itself was precarious and hazardous, and every morning an adventure into the unknown. We would exhibit our Literature, our Art, our Architecture, if not indubitably inspired, yet respectable as judged by all but the highest standards; with an intelligence ever more widely diffused, much reading, some thought, even an original or, at least, a courageous outlook towards the bigger problems of human existence and human destiny. Exhibit our poverty, we confront it with our charity; show the ravages of disease, cancer, appendicitis, complaints of the brain, nerves, and stomach, we retort with the revelation of our warfare against disease, maintained with a devotion and a determination unparalleled in all past ages. If we have Atheisms, here are all our Churches; if Social Maladies, our Social Reformers. That any future estimate should associate us even in thought with the dying days of Rome or the nightmare of the medieval twilight seems to us a proposition obviously unthinkable.

We have to remember, however, in such an estimate, that each generation appears in the roll book of the centuries, not as it appears to itself, but as it appears to observers gazing, as from a distance, over a gulf of time. What records survive, what remains available, when all the little pleasantnesses and amenities of little, comfortable, satisfied people have vanished over the limits of the world? Imagine, for example, the twentieth century interpreted in the twenty-fifth by its popular newspapers: to-day, more certainly than its popular drama, the abstract and mirror of the time. England seen through the medium of its Sunday press—the press which to seven out of ten of its present inhabitants represents their sole connection with the world outside their local lives—takes upon itself an appearance of violence and madness. Men and women knife each other in the dark; children are foully butchered by unknown assailants; suicides sprinkle every page—now that a girl may die with another woman's husband; now that a family may escape from the hell of unemployment; now simply for life weariness, because the whole effort of life has lost significance and crumbled into dust and ashes. The most insistent noise which reverberates through their pages is the clicking of the huge machine of English justice, as couples once married in affection are torn apart, or a long procession of murderers, thieves, absconding solicitors, fraudulent company promoters, are swept away into the cold silence of the penal prison. The supply seems never to run dry. The various Courts are in continuous sitting, and yet never overtake the work so bountifully provided. Itinerant justices are even compelled to journey round the countryside, arresting their courses at the principal towns, in order more speedily to deal with the continuous parade of violence, outrage and unnatural crimes. Is it possible, one can imagine the future historian demanding, that anyone could have been in those days altogether sane? as he pictures the decent wayfarer stealing furtively through labyrinthine ways lest ruffians should spring upon him in the dark, clutching his difficult savings for fear that they should be snatched from him, with terror or poverty yawning before him, against which no prudence can guard, in a city visibly given up to the dominion of lust and greed. All this is in England: with a Sunday press, if liberally providing the salt and color which so many colorless lives demand, yet on the whole committed to some standard of accuracy, some reflection of the fact in the record. In America, where such limitations are voted tiresome, the vision becomes gigantic, monstrous, like the sky-scrapers of its distorted cities. The observer who, in a future civilisation which may arise there, should attempt reconstruction of the barbaric past from a file of the New York Sunday editions would find himself plunged into a region grotesque and hideous, like evil dreams.

But the survival of this peculiar literature is too impossible—perhaps too dreadful—an assumption. Let us assume that the great works will endure—the poetry, the fiction, the social studies and declamations of the representative people of the age. Are we in any better plight? Select ten, say, of the greatest writers of the Victorian era, and attempt from them a reconstruction of the Victorian age. The product is a human society so remote from all benignant and kindly ways as to demand nothing so much as the advent of a kindly comet which will sweep the whole affair away. Our fathers led their decent, austere lives in that Victorian age which now seems so remote from us, making their money, carrying out their business and boisterous pleasure, inspired by their vigorous, if limited, creeds. They wrangled about politics and theology; they feasted at Christmas, and in the summer visited the seaside; they gave alms to the poor, and rejoiced that they lived in nineteenth century England. But to the prophets of their age they were unclean from crown of head to sole of foot, a people who had exhausted the patience of God. You may choose your verdict where you please—in Carlyle's "torpid, gluttonous, sooty, swollen, and squalid England," given up to the "deaf stupidities and to the fatalities that follow, likewise deaf"; or, in Ruskin's interpretation of the "storm cloud" as "a symbol of the moral darkness of a nation that has blasphemed the name of God deliberately and openly, and has done iniquity by proclamation, every man doing as much injustice to his brother as it was in his power to do." You may accept the condemnation kindly, as in Meredith's "folly perpetually sliding into new shapes in a society possessed of wealth and leisure, with many whims, many strange ailments, and strange fancies"; the condemnation plaintive, as in Arnold's "brazen prison," in which most men, with "heads bent o'er their toil," languidly "their lives to some unmeaning task-work give"; the condemnation defiant and rejoicing, as in Morris: "Civilisation which I know now is destined to perish; what a joy to think of." You may find it rising to a rather shrill shriek in the later Tennyson, with his protest against the city children—who "soak and blacken soul and sense in city slime"—with his calling upon vastness and silence to swallow up the hateful noises of his clamorous, intolerable day. You may hear it sinking to a deep note of strong repudiation in that vision of a city, "perchance of death but certainly of night," in the heart of which from the pulpit of a great cathedral a strange preacher proclaims the triumph of night and its despairs. One observer looking to the future will see "the whole life of the immense majority of its inhabitants, from infancy to the grave, a dreary routine of soulless, mechanical labor." Another will call for a cosmic cataclysm to quickly make an end. Another in a more chilling indifference will turn away from the unlovely sight as a society irrelevant, impossible. Literature has no tolerance for the life of comfort and security which to so many of its people seemed the last word of human welfare. And no reconstruction from the work of genius, of the vanishing present, could provide any judgment much more satisfying to our pride than the judgment of summarised adultery and violence which is the weekly enjoyment of so many million readers.

We turn for vindication to those few writers who have attempted the difficult task of describing the present, reading the vision, even if they cannot provide the interpretation. Such work must of necessity be largely autobiographical. It demands a fearlessness in confession which very few men will exhibit, an absence of reticence and the fear of "giving oneself away," which, in an England clouded with class prejudices and the survivals of dying prohibitions, necessitates an unusual boldness, an unusual honesty. Mr. H. G. Wells, for example, stands amongst the first of such contemporary realists. He never grimaces to show his cleverness, like Mr. Bernard Shaw, nor exercises intellectual agility in extravagance like Mr. G. K. Chesterton. He has set down the world as he found it: it is to the advantage of English literature that he has lived through the world of the lower Middle Class, and endured the retail draper's emporium and the bleak life of the aspiring schoolmaster who studies "science" for inadequate reward. And the result is that "Kipps" and "Mr. Lewisham" and the hero of "Tono-Bungay" will come to stand as a vivid and not unsympathetic interpretation of certain phases of English life in one of its great periods of change—change none the less compelling because for the most part resident in the kingdom of the soul. Mr. Arnold Bennett, again, in "The Old Wives' Tale," has provided a middle-class manufacturing England for future wonder and judgment: in a pitiless picture, told with little sympathy, but with detachment and insight. Mr. Bullock has nearly, if not quite, succeeded with the suburban clerk: and an amalgam of many lesser but sincere writers—the optimism and cheery humor of Mr. Pett Ridge, the gloom and revolt of George Gissing, the sociological studies of mean streets, and all the ways of the Abyss, might help to reconstruct the chequered experiences of the London laborer in his incalculable multitude.

Yet the "human comedy" still remains unwritten. Most of these writers we have mentioned are deliberately distorting, in excess of darkness or sunshine. We know nothing of to-day's experience. We are uncertain whether civilisation is about to blossom into flower or wither in ruined tangle of dead leaves and faded gold. We can find no answer to the question, at the end of a dying year, whether we are about to plunge into a new time of tumult and upheaval, whether we are destined to an indefinite prolongation of the present twilight world, whether, as we sometimes try to hope, a door is to be suddenly opened, revealing unimaginable glories.

THE REALITY OF JESUS.

The story of the Gospels in the first three centuries or so shows that Christians every now and then were nervous about what they found there. For example, where Luke tells us that Mary said to Jesus "Thy father and I," some copyists quietly wrote "Joseph and I," as a safer phrase. The study of Matthew and Luke alongside of Mark will often reveal the editor's caution. Thus, when the Pharisees watched Jesus to see if he would heal the withered hand in the synagogue on the Sabbath, Mark says he "looked round about on them with anger." Luke, with Mark's narrative, or something like it, before him, copies the statement that Jesus "looked round about upon them all," but he quietly drops the words "with anger." Both he and Matthew had to compress Mark, but sometimes this compression meant more loss than gain, and certainly here, where it is at the cost of an intensely characteristic touch.

"With anger," says Mark. But Jesus had no anger for the woman taken in adultery—indeed, nervous moralists have felt he might have been clearer on the subject of her sin. He had no anger for any of what we call the grosser sins. Contemporary critics were baffled by this contrast. Here was a man, professedly holy, who was the "friend of publicans and sinners," consorted with them, and ate with them, while there was nothing too bad for him to say of the conscientious keepers of the law. Of course, for us the Pharisees have a bad name, though not a worse, we should remember, than deacons and parsons have in some quarters to-day. Labor people talk of "Liberal Nonconformist sweaters." In America to "deacon" a man means, in some places, to overreach him without actually getting within the clutches of the law.

Matthew is apt to mass the sayings of Jesus according to their subject without reference to time or place, and his twenty-third chapter is a collection of what Jesus said of the Pharisees, with the refrain: "Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites." As "Pharisee" and "hypocrite" are virtually synonyms to-day, this does not tell us much. The Greek word means "actors," and perhaps if we say "Scribes and Pharisees, actors!" we may catch the tone with which Jesus spoke, and the sense which he meant to convey. Men tell lies and act lies to deceive others, or to deceive God, if they can, but there is a worse habit of mind, which is reached when a man tries to take himself in, and succeeds in confusing his own sense of right and wrong. The Pharisee sometimes consciously tried to deceive others, but his chief victim was himself, and this Jesus saw—"blind Pharisee!" And here lies the gravamen of Jesus' attack. The Pharisee was an actor—if nowhere else, at least "in the theatre he carried under his hat." He enjoyed play-acting—audience or none. Some men cannot help posing, even when they are alone, and the Pharisee was of this class, an instinctive poseur, a man not interested in realities—and this was to Jesus, of all sins, the most intolerable. Sensualist and money-lover were at least occupied with a sort of reality; pleasure and money in their ways are real, and the pursuit of them brings a man, sooner or later, into contact with realities genuine enough. This is the attraction, perhaps, which artists have found in sin—they undoubtedly reach a sort of reality, of which men of conventions are ignorant, though they reach it at great cost. At any rate, the world looked after the illusions of publican and harlot, and they did not last long. The danger with these people was that they might be disillusionised overmuch. The Pharisee, on the other hand, lived in a mist of illusion, and realised nothing.

Jesus had been bred in a school of realities. When he said, "Blessed are ye poor, for yours is the kingdom of Heaven," his words are the record of experience—otherwise they would have been absurd and heartless mockery. If we may re-construct his own home life from his parables of home life, piecing them into the bare framework given us by the scanty hints of the evangelists, we find a story of hardship and poverty. A mother, who seems to have been a widow, with five sons and at least three daughters, a carpenter's shop, a ministry begun about the age of thirty—such is the framework, and Jesus tells us about old coats being patched till they will stand it no more, widows with adversaries, women who have to sweep diligently till they find a lost coin, little houses where the children share the father's bed, and brothers who may need to be forgiven till seventy times seven.

If such a life did not bring a man into touch with some realities, King Lear prayed in vain, when, after hours in storm, he said he would "pray" and come in, and his prayer was this:—

> "Poor naked wretches, wheresoe'er you are,
> That bide the pelting of this pitiless storm,
> How shall your houseless heads and unfed sides,
> Your loop'd and window'd raggedness, defend you
> From seasons such as these? Oh! I have ta'en > Too little care of this. Take physic, pomp, > Expose thyself to feel what wretches feel."

Jesus had been exposed "to feel what wretches feel"; he knew what others talked about—hunger, cold, "the rich man's scorn, the proud man's contumely." He was the poor man, for whom the facts of life are naked, and the edges of things hard and sharp—realisable enough. He learnt the habit of looking at things as they were, till he saw through them. If we may build on his use of the eighth Psalm, he, like, George Fox, had felt "the elements and stars come over him," and had, whether by "sitting still and letting it alone" or methods of his own, to wait or struggle till he came over them and touched "the living God who made all things." Poverty was, perhaps, even for him, the key which opened his first door into the kingdom of Heaven. At all events, he always emphasises the advantage of disadvantages—they make a man in earnest with himself. The Church has cherished one of his characteristic words in Amen: "Verily, verily."

There is a revelation of the seriousness of his whole mind and nature in his reply to the follower who would go away and then come back to follow. "No man, having put his hand to the plough and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God." "Hoc age," said the Roman. If a man is ploughing, he must think of his ploughing and leave other things alone—anyone who has driven a furrow knows this; and all men of action know only too well that the man whom Jesus describes is fit for no kind of Kingdom—none, at least, of which we should care to have experience. It is only in the Kingdom of Heaven that we suppose the flabby-minded to be at home. But Jesus did not think so.

The same energy of mind is seen in the parables. The unjust steward was, no doubt, a rascal, but he was in earnest with himself. The man who found the treasure in the field was, perhaps, not quite honest, but the point is that he concentrated himself on the matter in hand. Even the unjust judge took the shortest and most direct road to quiet. The pearl merchant let everything go to gain the one pearl of great price. Mary, we know, chose the one thing needful, and was praised for it. We may be sure from all this that there was one carpenter shop in Nazareth where benches were made to stand on four feet at once and doors to open and shut.

When so clear an eye for reality is turned upon religion, it is apt to see pretty far into religion also. There, too, it will reach the central thing. The notions of the day are looked through, and the essentials are seen with an unusual distinctness. Men of this habit of mind shock their contemporaries by the abrupt nakedness of their religious conceptions. God, righteousness, eternity, heaven and hell, are to such men realities. God does not surprise them as He does the rich fool, with His sudden tap on the shoulder. He is the great reality, never absent from their minds. Thus to Jesus, God is the great heart of the universe, builder of starry skies, lover of birds, father of men, concerned with everything that is real, with no interest in shams and conventions. Righteousness and the kingdom of Heaven are the expressions of God and man in unison; hell is man dissociating himself from God—unspeakable realities, all of them.

Other men round him talked of God and righteousness, heaven and hell. Righteousness was with them the tithing of mint, the keeping of the Sabbath, the ritual of the temple—"Acting!" said Jesus, with the clear incisiveness of genius. What was a handful of mint to God, or the seventh day to Him who made the sun rise on all days? Was God a Levite? "What, in the name of God, do you believe God to be?" And hell—what help had mint for a man here? "How can ye escape the damnation of hell?" What a thing it would be to reach life, even at the cost of a hand, a foot, an eye! No, their righteousness was casuistry—pretty, like a whited sepulchre, but what lay beneath it? What of the widows' houses? the starving children of Abraham?

We read sayings of Jesus, on the fulfilment of the law and the keeping of the commandments to the last and least. The instinctive "higher criticism" of the Christian world has left these sayings in the gospel, but excised them in practice by forgetfulness or allegory. It is in any case quite evident that they could not mean from the lips of Jesus, if he spoke them at all, what they would have meant from a Pharisee's. The whole Jewish law was abolished once and for all by Jesus, though Christians have been sedulous in restoring it. But Jesus anticipated modern anthropology and folklore, and cut away every vestige of "primitive" and "savage" survival from religion—all the taboos, helpful perhaps to primitive man and the savage, but confusing to men on a higher plane—or else mere play-acting and the "damnation of hell." Paul called Jesus the "Yes" of all the promises of God—a splendid name for the vindicator and exponent of all God's realities. It is such a man as this who liberates mankind.

When the Christian world grows nervous, as it periodically does, lest the bases of the Christian faith are being sapped, when this and the other thing is questioned which we have always believed, it is a strength and a consolation to study the character of Jesus, who was not nervous. He moved among people as orthodox and as fidgety as ourselves, and he laughed at them, sometimes with a tone of pity, sometimes of anger. The great thing is to remember that he at least faced the facts of life, saw them naked, and felt their hard edges. Nothing angered him except make-believe, and he was the friend of the candid, however scandalous their record.

THE SEASONABLE WITCH.

One would have thought that man, being in any case the unhappiest of animals, might have contented himself with his misery rather than invent imaginary woes. In all conscience, this poor, thin-skinned creature, destitute of fur, has a nipping time of it against the frost, and what are his level little teeth compared to a crocodile's, or even to a wolf's? His horn-tipped hand is a feeble instrument beside the sheathed scimitars of a lion's paw. The cold racks him with cramps, the sun withers him with fever, the water drowns him, and if he falls from a precipice, instead of extending his wings upon the bed of air, he splits his skull like a pea. The porpoise beats him in breathing, and the midge in flight. He not only suffers the plague of hunger, to which all creation is exposed, but must further plague himself for clothes. Wherever he wanders through the world, he finds himself superfluous. He is crushed out by the numbers of his kind. Other animals kill their enemies for food, protection, or just to make room for themselves. Man alone kills his species, and still he seems too many. He eats everything, and still he starves.

Besides these miseries, mankind has tormented itself with illusory hopes. However comfortable he may be at any moment, he is always fretting for some greater comfort still. He is befooled by visions of beauty never to be realised, and the more virtuous he is, the more fervently he condemns himself as a miserable sinner. There is some excuse for this discontent. It springs from solid ground, for certainly it would be pleasant to live at ease in body and mind; one would much rather dwell in beautiful cities like the Acropolis than in Blackwall streets or Tooting suburbs; and as to virtue, no saint is so good but he must envy the unruffled self-esteem of tigers and other cats. The desire for better things is reasonable enough, though it is none the less on that account unhappy, and if the philosopher was right in saying that man's unhappiness comes of his greatness, man should be very great to carry it off.

But so far from being satisfied with this natural, though overwhelming, wretchedness of body and mind, man has never ceased to conjure up unreal and unnecessary torments of soul. With a desire for unhappiness, not to be appeased by the multitudinous forms of evil within himself, he has set to work and invented thousands on thousands of devils, imps, demons, ghosts, Gorgons, Hydras, and Chimæras, that never had an existence of any kind, except in the perturbed and melancholic imagination of the great self-torturer. It goes so far that all men and women among the hordes of Central and Southern Africa acknowledge innumerable evil spirits, but hardly one beneficent; and in like manner our fathers, not so long ago, though boasting themselves but a little lower than the angels, had less familiar acquaintance with angels than with fiends. To them, as to the African, the powers of evil lurked in every corner, lay in wait beside the path, and squatted upon the pillow. Till quite lately, the whole of mankind, except for a handful of Greeks and Romans, has passed a haunted and ghost-ridden life, crowded with vague terrors and hideous apprehensions, from which all the others of earth's children are free. Strangely varied as the races of mankind may be, incredible as it is that they could all have sprung from one human stock, here is a point in which they all agree, and we shall as soon find human beings without heads as without devils.

Even so the end of man's reckless chase after pain and terror is not reached. He proceeds to fix upon certain people to whom he ascribes peculiar intimacy with the evil powers which he has himself invented, and at once he surrounds them with a frightened awe. Among savages the man to whom these occult influences are attributed generally uses them in beneficent defence against the malignant spirits, though he may reverse his practice, since the science of opposites is the same. But among highly civilised people like ourselves, the workings of witch or wizard have nearly always been evil, and their powers destructive or misleading. It is true that the home of a wizard, or less frequently of a witch (owing to the more obvious malignancy of woman's nature), was sometimes visited in the hope of assistance, but it was usually for assistance in evil-doing—for some philtre, spell, or incantation to blast a rival or an enemy. These instruments of evil were endowed with the same kind of powers as bring woe upon us whenever we spill the salt, or walk under a ladder, or cross the knives, or fall upstairs before breakfast; but the powers were immeasurably heightened by the mysterious attributes of a human soul. To complete the irony of mankind's delight in his own terrors, both wizards and witches believed in their own dark traffic, they enjoyed the distinction of a wickedness which others had invented for them, and many a poor old woman was burnt to a cinder for Satanic acquaintanceship that she could not honorably deny.

The skinny witch as we know her—the witch of the Brocken, the Wrekin, and the domestic chimney—is a recent growth—only three or four centuries old. To the ancients the witch was not necessarily withered and hideous, but often of excellent beauty. Circe was bewitchingly lovable, and so was Medea; even Canidia had her charm. We have no exact description of the witch of Endor. But what we may call the broomstick type was developed only at the end of the Middle Ages, or later. The history of the whole matter has just been told with equal wit and knowledge by Mr. Oliver Madox Hueffer in his "Book of Witches" (Eveleigh Nash), and it makes admirable reading for Christmas Eve, all the more because to-night the perusal will be safe and free from fear. For, as is well known:—

> "Ever 'gainst that season comes
> Wherein our Saviour's birth is celebrated,
> The bird of dawning singeth all night long:
> And then, they say, no spirit can walk abroad;
> The nights are wholesome; then no planets strike,
> No fairy takes, nor witch hath power to charm,
> So hallow'd and so gracious is the time."

Almost the only king of our time who has produced a book (for which reason he was also called Solomon as possessing an intelligence beyond his class) devoted his intellectual powers mainly to the study of witchcraft; and, if we remember right, one of his earliest and most subtle chapters treats of the question why witches are commoner than wizards. He concludes that this peculiarity was due to the greater frailty of the feminine nature, more exposed to the wiles of Satan, as indeed was established in the case of Eve. Without questioning the authority of James I. or any other monarch upon the frailty of women thus exposed to wiles, we may venture without disloyalty to suggest that other reasons may have combined with this.

The old women of a village are usually poorer, more lonely, and uglier than the old men. The knowledge of simples and other drugs is a motherly thing and generally descends in the female line. Women have more natural affection for domestic animals, especially for cats, which have always been regarded as peculiarly subject to demoniac possession. Women are also known to come nearer to the open secret of nature, being themselves instinct with her primal powers. But, above all, as is daily proved, it is both easier and more enjoyable to persecute a woman than a man, and it was quite natural that the forefathers of our present population should experience a far keener pleasure in witnessing the burning of a witch than of a wizard.

It was a pleasure that they did not deny themselves. Sixteenth-century people had most opportunity of enjoying it, and Mr. Hueffer tells us that in 1524 over a thousand burnings of witches delighted the population of Como alone. It must have been quite a dull day when three women were not burnt in the square. As has often been proved, witchcraft flourishes most in times of religious decline or chaos, and it is noticeable that the one point on which Catholics and Protestants agreed was the holy joy of burning wiches. "I have no compassion on them," cried Martin Luther, always a downright man, whose words were battles: "I would burn them all." And throughout the seventeenth century, when the Protestant feeling in England was at its highest, more witches than usual afforded the sport of a public burning to a people that otherwise were taking their pleasures rather sadly. One of our best descriptions of the witch is Elizabethan in date, but is written by a disciple of John Knox:—

> "Witches be commonly old, lame, blear-eyed, pale, foul, and full of wrinkles; poor, sullen, superstitious, and Papists, or such as know no religion; in whose drowsy minds the devil hath gotten a fine seat; so as, what mischief, mischance, calamity, or slaughter is brought to pass, they are easily persuaded the same is done by themselves, imprinting in their minds earnest and constant imagination hereof."

All have gone now. They have vanished in the fog and filthy air, with their broomsticks smeared in child's liver, their eggshell boats, their Satanic dances, devilish Sabbaths, black masses, tailless rats, interchangeable cats, calling paddocks, and unholy herbs, slivered in the moon's eclipse. Redcap and Mother Shipton stand as the shadows of great names where tram meets tram, but the magic women whom our fathers knew and burnt have gone without a trace, unless we find it in the palmistry and crystal gazing of suburban bazaars. Mr. Hueffer thinks we rather regret their going. It may be so, for the picturesque mind regrets everything that is past, and there is nothing that mankind would not be rather than happy. But perhaps in our search for picturesque misery we might take a moment's consideration for the old village women who are now speculating on their chances of five shillings a week rather than on their probable death in flames.

Present-Day Problems.

THE NEW SOUTH AFRICA.

After sitting for rather less than a month at Durban, the South African Convention for the closer union of the different Colonies adjourned, and met again at Cape Town after an interval of a fortnight. The adjournment was necessitated by the heat in Durban, which is a charming winter resort, but becomes uncomfortably warm in the South African summer, and by the health of Sir Henry De Villiers and Mr. Steyn, both of whom have felt the effects of assiduous work in the increasing heat. The adjournment was regretted by those who hoped for a complete settlement to be arrived at in a few days or weeks. Considering the magnitude and complexity of the problems involved, it would seem that an adjournment might be an advantage in itself, apart from the causes which necessitate it. If there were serious difficulties in the Convention, a fortnight's reflection might have facilitated solution by giving time for diverting attention from the narrow points of opposition to alternative courses generally acceptable. If the path of the Convention has been smooth, delay may have done much towards clearing up minor points, and so enabling the Convention to produce a finished and considered work.

The position in South Africa requires equal vigilance and sympathy on the part of onlookers in England. Some who criticise for the sake of criticising have objected to the Convention's carrying on its deliberations with closed doors. This is wholly unreasonable, for it would obviously be a gratuitous addition to the difficulties of the delegates to invite a running commentary of irresponsible criticism during the progress of the negotiations; and, indeed, had it been decided that the proceedings of the Convention must be in public, the probable result would have been that the Convention would have been a formality, and that the real work would have had to be done in advance by informal and unsatisfactory, because imperfectly representative, committees. The decision of the Convention to close its doors was plainly wise, and it is not a little remarkable that its secrets have been so well kept that few, if any, except the delegates themselves, appear to have any real information of the situation in the Convention. But this means that until the Convention announces its resolutions no one else, either in South Africa or in England, can begin to consider questions of great intricacy and importance which may call for prompt decision. For it is now said—and it is known that this was all along intended by the leaders in South Africa—that an attempt is to be made to pass the new Constitution through the South African and Imperial Parliaments next year. This would mean that the South African Parliaments would be called upon to give their decisions not later than April, and that if a decisive opinion in favor of a definite scheme can be obtained in South Africa, the Constitution Bill may be before the House of Commons next June. It is clearly desirable, to say the least, that the Bill as sent from South Africa to London should be such as to command the whole-hearted assent of Parliament, and the Australian precedent proves that it will be difficult to introduce alterations when once the scheme has been adopted by the Colonial Legislatures. It therefore follows that if the voice of England is to be heard effectively, it ought, if possible, to speak before the scheme comes before the South African Parliaments. That is to say, we may have a scheme published early in next year, and then find that we ought to make up our minds about its main features before April. If this is so, it must be admitted that we should do well to prepare ourselves for the consideration of this great problem at once.

It must not be supposed that in saying so much we mean that the South African Constitution should be moulded in accordance with the wishes of quidnuncs in London. There are, however, one or two general questions in which South Africa is not alone concerned. Apart from such questions as were regarded as Imperial questions when the Australian Commonwealth Constitution was under discussion, and the lingering racial questions which appear to burn mainly in the minds of a few irreconcilables in England, there is the native question, in which the House of Commons has a direct interest, not only because it is bound to regard all classes of South Africans with impartial good-will, whatever their view, race or color, but also because the three protectorates—Basutoland, Bechuanaland, and Swaziland—are at present administered by the High Commissioner, who is an Imperial officer, and are not immediately represented at the Conference, though they are likely to be much affected by its decisions. Here, again, we must enter a caveat. It does not follow from what has been said that any action or representations on the part of the people or government of the United Kingdom will be necessary after the completion of the negotiations in South Africa, or even after the closing of the Convention. On the contrary, it is much to be hoped that when the Convention has completed its labors, it will be found that its decisions are such as to commend themselves to the favorable judgment both of South Africa and of the United Kingdom. We are very far indeed from distrusting South Africa, and, while we shall continue to deprecate interference in the purely domestic concerns which ought to be left to the decision of the South Africans, we wish to insist that on those matters about which it is reasonable and right for England to speak, she should be prepared to speak, not, indeed, hastily, but promptly and considerately, and we add an expression of our earnest hope that when the time for speaking comes, it may only be necessary to recognise that the decisions of the Convention are reasonable, just, and adequate.

There are good reasons for hopefulness in this respect. When the Convention met it was suggested in some influential quarters that difficult questions should be left over for the decision of the Parliament about to be created. That that Parliament will have difficult questions to deal with goes without saying; but it appeared that there was an intention to leave over not only questions of legislative and administrative difficulty, but also some questions which would most naturally be decided in the Constitution Act. On the other hand, there were many of the wisest men in South Africa who recognised the difficulty and danger of this course, and Dr. Jameson, on leaving Cape Town for the Convention, said that the Convention was likely to last for a considerable time, "one of the main objects being to settle, as far as possible, all outstanding difficulties before an actual Union is consummated, so that the new Union Parliament can have a fair start to deal with the general progress of the country." It appears that this aim has been kept before the Convention. Apart from the rumors which have been circulated in South Africa, there is the fact that the sittings have already been prolonged, and that they are still some way from being ended. Had there been any hopeless diversity of opinion, it could hardly have been kept secret so long. On the whole, then, there is good reason for hoping that questions which ought to be faced now are being faced, and that there is at least a fair chance of arriving at a generally acceptable settlement.

There are, as we have said, two general questions which attract attention and excite active interest in England. There are some who fear that the English-speaking section of the community will suffer at the hands of the Dutch-speaking section. There are others who fear that the rights of the natives may not be sufficiently safeguarded in the new Constitution for it to be possible for the Imperial authorities to view the new instrument of government with real satisfaction, or to part with the direct control of the protectorates. As to the first point, it seems clear that racial feeling no longer runs very high in South Africa itself. We have had an energetic and interesting debate on the diplomatic history of the South African war in the Press of Europe, but though in Europe some of the chief personages of the time have taken part in the discussion, in South Africa hardly any interest has been aroused. It seems evident that these people are too much interested in the present and future to be greatly disturbed by the ghosts of the past. One or two fanatical busybodies have a string of grievances which they produce in Parliament, but investigation has plainly shown that, though Lord Milner showed racial bias in his management of the Civil Service and of the settlers in the Transvaal and Orange Colony, General Botha and Mr. Fischer have scrupulously avoided anything of the kind. Occasional appeals to racial suspicion are, no doubt, to be heard in South Africa, but, on the whole, more attention seems to be given to men like General Smuts, who insist that there is no reason for it. A correspondent of the "Times" has seen Mr. Steyn, who put the case to him with equal candour and force. The Boers, he said, cannot at present be expected to display enthusiasm about being British subjects, but they gave their word when the war ended, and instead of enthusiasm, which is often effervescent, they offer the more solid and stable surety of a whole people's honor. About the same time General De Wet protested against continuing the sittings of the Convention on the King's birthday, urging that it would be unseemly to do so. Some may question the sincerity of this. To us it appears to be exactly in keeping with the whole temper of the Boers. They do not simulate enthusiasm, but they have a keen sense of what they have undertaken, and of what is fitting in men who have promised and received what they have. Respect for English forms and susceptibilities follows, and is inconsistent with a policy of racial exclusiveness. Could the most exacting Imperialist desire a more satisfactory frame of mind for a people so recently and so unwillingly brought into the Empire?

The native question is more difficult. In Cape

Colony the best men of both races recognise the importance of not excluding anyone from the franchise merely on account of his color. In the other South African Colonies the native franchise has not been judged by experience, but signs of the spread of just and reasonable views are not wanting. Cordial messages have been exchanged between the Griquas of Kokstad and the South African Convention, and only the other day Mr. Lionel Phillips was able to make a speech to the Rand Pioneers, probably the least pro-native body in South Africa, advocating the admission of duly qualified natives to the franchise. It would be unwise to hope too much, but it is not impossible to hope that an equitable arrangement may be arrived at on this point also. In the Cape Colony a native policy at once humane, just, progressive, and prudent has resulted from the native franchise. There is no reason to doubt that the same cause would produce the same effect in South Africa as a whole. The white population of South Africa owes much, and recognises that it owes much, to the grant of freedom and representative government. It surely is not to be thought of that it will miss the moral in its dealings with the colored races.

The Drama.

MR. TREE AND THE FAIRIES.

In the Municipal Art Gallery in Dublin, there hangs a drawing by "Max" wherein we see Mr. W. B. Yeats introducing Mr. George Moore to the Queen of the Fairies. There is now a fine opportunity for a companion picture, in which the same artist should show Mr. Graham Robertson performing the same office for Mr. Beerbohm Tree. The introduction has been most happily effected, and Mr. Tree is already on excellent terms with Her miniature Majesty. In other words, "Pinkie and the Fairies" is a capital Christmas entertainment for children. It is what we have all been clamoring for this many a year—a graceful fairy-play without any vulgarity, and really written for children, not for grown-ups who have learnt to seek their fairy-land in the music-halls. On the evening when I saw it, many children around me were enjoying it hugely; and no doubt many thousands of other children will follow their example before the holidays are over. I am, by profession, one of the naughty, discontented children who always cry for more; and I shall presently make some suggestions to Mr. Tree as to the further development of his relations with the Fairy Queen. But first I wish to bear emphatic witness to the pleasantness, the beauty, and the refinement of the spectacle he has actually provided.

Certainly there never was a children's play more brilliantly cast. It was a happy idea to engage Miss Ellen Terry for the part of Aunt Imogen. Fifty, nay sixty, years hence, when the century is on the wane, old fogeys will wag their heads and say: "Ah! I remember Ellen Terry in the days of Edward the Seventh! She was in the first play I ever saw, and her grace and charm, her shimmering, half-tearful gaiety, are as clear as daylight in my memory. Begad, sir, in her most ordinary movements she reminded you of the phrase of that Irish poet fellow—she 'danced like a wave of the sea'!" Then, in point of beauty and distinction, nothing could be better than Miss Stella Campbell's Molly, or Miss Marie Löhr's Cinderella. Miss Viola Tree, as the Sleeping Beauty, makes up, by means of her fine and well-trained voice, for the rather slender musical gifts of some of her companions. Master Philip Tonge is a capital schoolboy, playing with unforced humor, and without shrillness or obtrusiveness. The anonymous little lady who plays the Queen of the Fairies is a marvel of prettiness and of diminutive dignity. She is also a highly trained dancer; but I cannot conscientiously say that it gives me much pleasure to see so young a child pirouetting in a ballet-skirt. On the other hand, for simple childlike naturalness, nothing could have been better than Miss Iris Hawkins's Pinkie. It was throughout a model of alert intelligence and unstudied grace—one of the most delightful child-performances I ever saw. To dilate on the beauty of the scenery and mounting would be manifestly superfluous—the best warranty for that is the line in the playbill: "Produced by Herbert Beerhohm Tree." Several of the effects in the fairy woodland of the second act (painted by Mr. Joseph Harker) are even more exquisite than anything we have hitherto seen on His Majesty's stage.

All this one can say for the production with the utmost sincerity—where, then, is there any possible room for discontent? What more can the most exacting of critics desire? Well, I do not think it would be quite unreasonable to ask for a little story. Mr. Graham Robertson is an ingenious and accomplished writer; he has humor, he has fancy, he has metrical skill, he has even imagination; but as yet he is not the least little bit of a dramatist. His characters (the human ones, I mean) are vague and uninteresting; and "story, God bless you, he has none to tell, sir." Tommy and Pinkie, indeed, are drawn with sufficient spirit. They are the typical boy and girl of the better sort of modern child's story. But when we come to Molly, what a queer shadow of a part it is! There is absolutely no color or consistency in it—nothing for Miss Stella Campbell to take hold of. We do not know whether she is sympathetic or not—she is simply dull. Her relations with her unseen lover are never for a moment interesting, and, save at one trifling point, are wholly unconnected with the main business of the play—that is to say, the fairy scenes. Mr. Robertson might have taken a hint from Shakespeare in the interweaving of mortal fortunes with fairy influences. Still more shadowy, if possible, are the two Aunts and the Uncle. In the entrance of the Aunts, and the whole conception of the garden scene, there are distinct reminiscences of "Prunella"; but Lawrence Housman and Granville Barker, with all their quaintness of fancy and delicacy of touch, made their three old maids real to us. Aunt Caroline and Aunt Imogen, on the other hand, have no tangible or consistent characteristics. It is surely essential in a children's play, if in no other, that we should know whether we like or dislike the personages; but here the author gives us no materials for forming a judgment. Aunt Imogen, no doubt, is amiable, because she is Miss Ellen Terry; but never, assuredly, was so great an actress allotted so insignificant, so non-existent, a part. To look for character in fairies would perhaps be unreasonable; but at least there might have been some plot, some coherent action, to bind the incidents together, and give the play a beginning, middle and end. There is, in fact, nothing of the sort. The ingenuity which Mr. Robertson shows in minor details deserts him when it comes to invention and construction. He stipples skilfully, but he is no hand at design.

Now, it is assuredly very difficult to invent a good fairy tale; and that is one among many reasons for the suggestion I have to make to Mr. Tree. Why seek to invent? Why impose this almost impossible task upon the Christmas playwright? Why not draw upon the inexhaustible fund of fairy-lore which the children love, and give us, quite frankly, a renewed, a refined, a glorified pantomime? I have for years preached the doctrine that pantomime is an invaluable art-form; well worth freeing from the vulgarities, and imbecilities, and corruptions which have overgrown it. Within its admirably elastic framework there is room for humor, for poetry, for fantasy, for satire, for "everything by turns and nothing long." Why should not Mr. Tree be the man to bring to perfection this delightful and truly national form of fairy extravaganza—to shows us what pantomime might be and ought to be? A great deal would depend, no doubt, on finding the right librettist or librettists; but this ought not to be an insuperable difficulty. How about a collaboration between Mr. Graham Robertson (for the lyrics and details of dialogue) and that Universal Provider for children of this favored generation, Mr. E. V. Lucas? It seems to me that Mr. Lucas has a rare combination of the requisites for such work, in his understanding of children and his vein of airy, facile, allusive persiflage. One thing I would strongly urge on the regenerator of pantomime, and that is a return to the free use of selected music, of familiar airs. It is the greatest possible mistake to give the children nothing but new music, however good its quality. And, finally, Mr. Tree should by no means disdain to take a personal share, occasionally at any rate, in the Christmas revels at his theatre. His fantasy would find admirable scope in such a part as the Robber Chief or the Wicked Magician; and think what an attraction it would be! The Queen of the Christmas Fairies is a potentate to whom an artist of Mr. Tree's humane and genial spirit need never blush to do ungrudging homage.

THE PLACE OF JACOB JORDAENS.

NOBODY who has visited the big galleries at Antwerp, Brussels, and Dresden, can have failed to carry away a vivid impression of the pictures of Jacob Jordaens. His work stands apart from that of the contemporary Antwerp school; if, indeed, a strong individuality were the sole test of greatness, then Jordaens would be the greatest master that Flanders ever produced. As it is, he takes the third place in the famous seventeenth-century triumvirate, consisting of Rubens, Van Dyck, and himself; yielding, in the eyes of the modern connoisseur of Flemish art, only to the two world-famed artists whose names are given. Granted his inferiority to these, the only matter to be decided is by how much he is inferior. Does he approach nearly to Rubens, who may be said to have sealed the reputation of the Antwerp School as a school of colorists? And does he provoke a just comparison with Van Dyck, who grafted on to the vigor of Flemish painting an alien grace of style? The answers to these questions are partly given in M. Max Rooses' magnificently illustrated "Life and Work" of Jacob Jordaens, translated by Miss E. C. Broers, wherein the art of Jordaens is analysed with affectionate thoroughness. As conservator of the Plantin-Moretus Museum in Antwerp, as an acknowledged authority on Flemish art, and as one who has a particularly sympathetic appreciation of all that is good in the painting of Jordaens, M. Rooses is more than qualified to express an opinion, and this fine volume will be the more appreciated for the reason that Jordaens has had but few modern biographers, and, so far as this country is concerned, has only recently begun to be understood by the wider public.

Whatever may be the latter-day inclination to dismiss Jordaens simply as a follower of Rubens, he was ranked far higher both by the public and the artists of his own time. If it is necessary to place him in any school, it must be the school of Rubens, since he was undeniably influenced by that master, especially in the work of his second period; but it is equally evident that he retained his individuality through all the stages of his art life, and that contemporary opinion was fully aware of the essential differences between the two men. Again, touching the Rubens influence, it is clear from certain religious pictures, notably the several renderings of the "Adoration of the Kings," that he leaned on Rubens for guidance in composition. At the same time one should not forget that, as M. Rooses points out, in at least one work of Rubens, the Madrid "Disciples at Emmaus," the master followed the example set by Jordaens in his picture of the same subject in the Brunswick Gallery. Briefly, the relationship between the two artists was never that of master and humble pupil. The utmost that can be said is that their art developed along parallel lines. If similarities are observable in their respective works, there are also radical differences—differences that go deep beneath the surface, differences of temperament, of outlook upon life, of artistic conviction. The actualities of their two lives would alone have sufficed to render these differences inevitable. Rubens was a traveller, a diplomatist; Jordaens a stay-at-home burgher. Rubens went to Italy, absorbed Italian art, took what he required for his purpose, and returned home to graft it on to a native talent without destroying—as so many of his Flemish predecessors had done—the native talent. Jordaens was never in Italy, and owed nothing to her. The one ennobled and enriched Flemish painting both by what was in himself and what he acquired elsewhere, while the other gave it only what was his own to give. Both painted the Flemish people; but whereas Rubens saw in his models the figures of heroes and heroines, Jordaens saw them merely as they were. One bond of union, that of a common love of strong color, sometimes makes their works similar to the superficial eye. But in every other quality, and more often than not in color also, they are separated by a very wide gulf. Rubens, with his taste for the heroic, his relish for the sumptuous in line and color, his strong subjectiveness, was an aristocrat among the Flemish painters of his generation. Jordaens, with an equal eye for color, but with less poetic imagination, with his greater interest in the world immediately around him and his objective standpoint, was emphatically the Commoner.

It is useless to seek in his art for the more strictly imaginative qualities belonging to his great compatriot. In one or two of his altar-pieces he could rise to strange heights of impressiveness, but they are in no sense typical of what was best in him; and one is conscious that what he achieved therein was largely borrowed. But in his own sphere, the sphere of the burgher life around him, he was unequalled. Out of the quaint custom of the Epiphany feast, or a town marriage, or birth, or other celebration, he could evolve a picture that radiated the truth of the life he saw; his power of deft snapshot characterisation, as shown in the oft-repeated subject of "The King Drinks," is equal to that of Hals. He had some knowledge of mythology, which he turned with sufficient inventiveness to the glorification of the jollier side of burgher life. Out of mythology "he chose neither the tragic nor the epic episodes, but only the homely ones"—the episodes, in a word, that allowed him to introduce his fellow-countrymen, as the characters, engaged in the ordinary social pursuits of his own country. In another favorite subject, "The Peasant and the Satyr," the personæ are Flemings, even the satyr being but thinly disguised. Being a Commoner, intent on truth alone, he often painted the truth that was coarse, and painted it coarsely; while in rendering a biblical story, such as that of "Susanna and the Elders," he indulged in humor that the modern mind might consider offensive. In this respect he is nearer to the Dutch School than to that of the South Netherlands, to Brouwer rather than to Rubens; though it should be borne in mind that it was the middle-class burgher, not the boorish peasant, that Jordaens delighted in painting. He did not, like Rembrandt or Millet, ennoble the plain and prosaic with his brush. He did not paint either to ennoble or debase. Coarseness and refinement had no place in his ambition, nor reverence and irreverence in his aim. He loved to represent his own ring of humanity, in happy mood if occasion offered, always, at any rate, as it appeared to him, never as it might be. If the quality of his painting is not consistent throughout, his single-minded devotion to the immortalising of his own people never faltered. Artists have been called great history painters for much less.

M. Rooses has had no easy task in collecting materials for a life of Jordaens. Beyond what the civic records tell one, there are but few data available. It is established, however, that he was born in 1593 and died in 1678; that he was blessed with a private competence and enjoyed a more or less peaceful existence, at any rate until he came under the observation of the ecclesiastical authorities as the writer of certain heretical tracts. His conversion to Calvinism late in life throws a rather curious sidelight on the character both of the man and of his age; for, although he was no lukewarm adherent of the new faith, and actually suffered a heavy fine for upholding its principles, it was after his conversion that he painted the "Last Judgment," now in the Louvre, with Calvin among the Damned falling into the abyss! Many another commission was as openly accepted by him for Catholic Churches as it was openly given by Catholic ecclesiastics; from which it is obvious that, in the eyes both of Jordaens and his patrons, the claims of art over-ruled those of Mother Church. Other work of a public character, known to have been executed by him, proves the important position he occupied in the art world of his own time. When Rubens died he was appointed—without challenge—to execute the pictures for Greenwich Palace, and a similar commission from Queen Christina of Sweden is on record; neither of the latter work, however, nor of the Greenwich decorations is there now any trace. He collaborated with Rubens in the decorations for the State entry of the Cardinal-Infant Ferdinand into Antwerp in the year 1634. He was employed on decorative work at Amsterdam, at Hulst, at Antwerp; while in the ornamentation of the Orange Hall at the House in the Wood he was singularly honored in being the only Flemish artist invited. Like Rubens, he was nominally responsible for an enormous output, only a fraction of which was wholly by his hand. He stands, perhaps, alone in his circle, in not having made preliminary sketches for his big works. Yet, in addition to his oil pictures, endless drawings, done for their own sakes, have remained to witness his activity; he was an etcher of no mean merit, and he was recognised by the Guild of St. Luke as a "water painter." One cannot read this volume without realising that, if he derived from no school and founded none, if he produced almost as many failures as successes, he was, nevertheless, a profoundly impressive force in Flemish art.

THE SORROWS OF AN AUSTRIAN LIBERAL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I crave from you space for the enclosed letter from my friend, Professor Leon Kellner, of Vienna University, who, as you will see, has penned it as an appeal to English Liberals? I make the request "without prejudice." As my friend knows, I have no great faith in the alleged "mission" of my own country to manage other peoples; and I have the same constitutional difficulty in ascribing to any other Empire a single-hearted concern for others' welfare when it forcibly extends its boundaries. But on the primary principles of fair play, to say nothing of hospitality, we owe, I think, a hearing to a good Austrian Liberal in a case that has been tried by our journals without much concern to look at both sides. Professor Kellner knows England as few foreigners do; he is actually one of our first philosophical authorities on early English; and every English Liberal will listen to him, I feel sure, with courteous attention.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN M. ROBERTSON.

December 17th, 1908.

MY DEAR ROBERTSON,—Really, this is more than I can bear—in silence. Mine is a most deplorable position. Till within a few weeks ago I was an Anglomaniac, and gloried in the title; to-day I am an Anglomaniac still, but have to hide my head in shame.

"What do you think of the English now?" is a question I hear from my colleagues every day.

"If I were you I should give the English a bit of my mind," is an exhortation my friends hurl at me morning, noon, and night.

"What's come over the English Press?" asks a former student of mine who, following my lead, subscribes to several London Liberal papers, THE NATION among the number, and thinks the English Liberal periodicals the most enlightened in the world.

Considering that to everyone who gives expression to his thoughts, there are dozens and dozens who look silent reproaches at me, my life as an interpreter of English culture in Austria is anything but easy.

And why do I say this to you of all people, you who have got nothing whatever to do with the English campaign against my country, who, all your life, have pleaded for international understanding against blind instincts of race and creed?

The answer is this: it is people like you who have made me an Anglomaniac, who have made me believe that England, in the midst of the world's strife and turmoil, is a haven of peaceful deliberation, a refuge from the sanguinary conflicts of primeval passions that are lacerating the Eastern nations of Europe. I have listened more than once to parliamentary speeches on foreign affairs, and have trained myself to believe that, as the outcome of unlimited freedom of speech, England enjoys more than any other nation the privilege of detachment and balance in dealing with the intricate policies of the European States. That is why I appeal to you to help me to justify myself in my own eyes. Give a poor Austrian Anglomaniac a chance of explaining what the Austrians at large think and feel about the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, just listen for a few moments to what we have got to say for ourselves against the incriminations of Servians and Turks who have been besieging your ears for months and months. As you well know, I do not belong to the inner circle; I belong neither to the diplomatic service, nor am I in the secrets of our Foreign Office. But I have been following Austrian events as a thoughtful member of the community, and may be safely considered an exponent of the feelings of the Austrian public at large.

1. Austria has got a mission in the Near East. England seems to have forgotten this fact or deliberately to ignore it. It is a fact all the same. It is we Austrians who have wrested Hungary, Transylvania, and other wide provinces from the clutches of barbarism, it is we who, for centuries and centuries, have borne the brunt of the battle against Asiatic predatory raids, it is we who have spread order and civilisation, banishing chaos, and anarch despotism. Austria, whom the English Press preposterously accuses of oppressing race, nationality, and creed, actually stands for freedom of race, nationality, and creed in the East of Europe, and we boast, rightly boast, that we have done for the conflicting interests of the manifold and variegated national fragments that have taken shelter under the wing of the Austrian eagle, something similar to what you English have achieved further afield. Austria has been, and is still, the battleground where Poles and Ruthenians, Germans and Czechs, Magyars and Croatians fight it out, not in the old fashion, popular still in Servia and Turkey, by barbarous bloodshed, and devastation, but according to the English method by ballot and parliamentary debate. I am aware that a large section of the English public takes its notions of Austria from the literature of the 'fifties and 'sixties of the last century, when mid-Victorian literature rang with indignation against Austrian oppression in Italy. As well might an Austrian derive his ideas of British rule in the Colonies from Longfellow's "Evangeline," not to mention other and more direct incriminations of American origin. All this is over and done with. Austria of to-day no more resembles the Austria of that time than your present England resembles Great Britain at the time of the Chartist riots. I do not think there is a spot on God's earth where conflicting races enjoy as much freedom as do the Poles, Ruthenians, Czechs, Roumanians, Croatians, Armenians, in the Austrian Empire. In fact, thoughtful Austrians consider this mission the chief raison d'être of our much-tried Austrian Empire; leave the welter of Austrian nationalities to themselves, and the world will be set aflame by the news of fierce struggles surpassing in extent and barbarity the atrocities of the Armenian type.

2. It is a preposterous delusion to consider Austria an agency of Pan-German aspiration. The deep distrust of German expansion which I noticed last summer in all the sections of the English population seems to be at the root of the present English campaign against Austria, the vast majority of the English mistaking Austria for a German dependency, and thus extending their antagonism to our country. Against this delusion I most emphatically protest. We have got no more to do with Pan-German aspirations than you, my dear Robertson, with the Celtic movement in England, and we are no more the cat's-paw of German expansion in the near East than you are the bottleholder of Japan in the United States. We claim to be an independent political unit whose interests are in more than one respect directly opposed to those of Germany and whose mission in the East of Europe precludes German methods and German aspirations. What you have heard of Germanising tendencies in Bosnia and Herzegovina is, not to put too fine a point on it, lies, lies, and lies again. Our administration in Bosnia and Herzegovina, which is admitted by both French and English observers to have done marvels in such a short time, is carried out by a select staff of officials of every race, German, Slavonic, Magyar, Roumanian, by people who have been trained in the old school of rigorous impartiality and justice. Their only aspiration is the welfare of the country, the control of which has been entrusted to Austria by the Treaty of 1887, and the only advantage we derive from this administration is an addition to our army, and a market for our goods. This market we are prepared to defend against all comers, it being the only outlet left to our industry and enterprise. Are the English so blinded by their distrust of Germany, that they do not see the blunder of setting all the world against Austria in her present crisis? In ordinary circumstances the Austrians, whether German or Slav, are extremely jealous of Austria's independent position, and the close alliance between her and Germany is being looked at askance by the majority of our population. Now, is it the deliberate aim of the present English campaign against Austria to drive her into the arms of Germany, to draw the bonds of alliance closer and closer? Deliberate or not, this is what your English campaign makes for. I do not pretend to understand the English mind. I cannot account for the English forgetfulness any more than I can puzzle out your grievance against my country. It sounds rather ungracious to remind you of the trying winter when the European Press swarmed with obscene caricatures of the English sovereign, and Austria was the only country that did not join in the chorus of hate and rejoicing over English defeats; but I cannot help reminding the English, that it was the Emperor Francis Joseph who, on more than one occasion, went out of his way to voice his sympathies with the English against their enemies of all kinds. If the English Press were what it is not, the mouthpiece of official wisdom, I should not be surprised, but the English Press being what it is, a popular institution, giving expression to popular feeling, there is only one course left to me, how to account for your acerbity against my country. The English, it seems, are never happy, unless they have got something or somebody to worry. I do hope you have had enough of worrying us; it's quite time to worry somebody else. You won't be at a loss for a convenient object at hand.—Yours, my dear Robertson, sincerely,

LEON KELLNER.

Letters to the Editor.

"THE IDEA OF BROTHERHOOD."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The severance between the forces of social reform and the churches, mentioned in the article on "The Idea of Brotherhood" in last week's NATION, is surely a disturbing portent. May I emphasise the causes, and, at the same time, point out how I think the democracy of to-day, like the democracy of Christ's day, is keeping alive the spirit of brotherhood in spite of the churches?

As a class, workpeople have well-nigh ceased to believe in what passes to-day as the religion of the churches. How often do you hear them call the church a capitalistic organisation! They will not attend because, they say, only employers, trades people, property owners, and usurers go to church. Mr. Charles Booth had to end his minute survey of the religious life of London with this admission—"The general conclusion is that the great mass of the people remain apart from all forms of religious opinion."

Your contributor puts down the causes rightly enough as belonging to the very psychology of "institutions," with their over-growth of forms, the priestly profession, and the worldly influences of property. It is a fact that nothing puts off workpeople sooner than the institutionalism of the church. In other words, ecclesiasticism. Workpeople themselves often call it churchianity. The thoughtful workman has learnt that officialism, institutionalism, and tradition have put a dead hand upon the church as upon other organisations. In the church, as in the army, these things make for caste and snobbery and inefficiency. "Officialism is the dry-rot of all the churches," Dr. A. Maclaren maintains, "and is found as rampant among democratic Nonconformists as amongst the more hierarchical communities."

Lately there has been a curious revival of church institutionalism. I saw an example only half an hour before I picked up THE NATION. In the last issue of the "New Age" Mr. Belloc rejoices in being a "Catholic," but pretends not to know what is meant by the word "Christianity." Thus Mr. Belloc reveals himself as the fine flower of church institutionalism. I can picture Mr. Belloc going gleefully to the stake for Catholicism. I can picture him just as gleefully committing other people to the stake for Christianity.

Now the Founder of the very religion that Mr. Belloc's institutionalism has several times well-nigh swept out of Europe during the last two thousand years, found church institutionalism His greatest enemy. It overcame Him at last, and the priests put Him to death. But if Christ found the church of His day steeped in institutionalism and tradition, we cannot forget that He refounded the church upon the democracy. He sought neither priest nor elder, but working men and working women very much like the workpeople outside the churches to-day.

What was done then has had to be done several times since. The common people have always saved the church from paralysis. If the church has not always come to the aid of the people, the people have always saved the church.

They are doing it in modern England. Since they have seen the church cold, unhelping, and often in opposition during the great Reform movements, they have turned their backs upon it. The church has no place in their lives. It is an alien institution, too often talking in an alien tongue. But when they ceased to believe in the church they did not cease to believe in Christianity. They gave it expression in idea of Brotherhood. It appeared sometimes as a Labor Church, sometimes as a Socialist Fellowship; but its more vital forms are seen in the Adult School movement and the P.S.A. movement.

These working-class movements have kept alive the spirit of brotherhood. They have helped to save the churches. Only in recent years have the churches awakened to any real sense of their influence. In London alone, the P.S.A. movement has, during its seventeen years' existence, established some one hundred and thirty societies, with about forty thousand members. Throughout the whole country the membership runs into hundreds of thousands; far greater than the total membership of some of the smaller churches. As regards the adult schools, nearly all of which are held early on Sunday mornings, these number close on one thousand, with about 70,000 members. Women's adult schools, with a membership of about 20,000, and schools for youths, with about 3,000 members, have sprung from the same movement.

Inspired by these examples, the Wesleyan Church has promoted Sunday Afternoon Men's Brotherhoods with much success all over the country. The Church of England is following with men's Sunday afternoon meetings. Thus the churches have had to turn from their institutionalism in order to get into touch with the people. The people, in their turn, have breathed new life into the churches.—Yours, &c.,

THE EDUCATION QUESTION IN 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—We are told that everyone is tired of the "Education Question," and, I am sure that no one can be more tired of the fruitless political wrangling of the last few years than those who are immersed in the practical work of school management. Three years have passed since the general election, but we have not yet got away from the superficial aspect of the Education Question which serves for the electoral platform. All this sectarian squabbling about two half-hours a week touches but two or three details of the great work of national education, important details, no doubt, especially on the political platform, but still only details. The other details are much more important to the children, but not as interesting as ecclesiastical fights or ecclesiastical bargains and "heroic" measures.

National education is mainly an administrative matter, and the administration, both national and local, was thoroughly demoralised by the late Tory Government. A Liberal Government, in three years, might have made many drastic reforms at Whitehall, and might have firmly introduced a more liberal spirit into local administration; but they were too busy. May we hope that something will be done before they leave office?

Let me give a few illustrations. The first and elementary duty of the administrators is to provide sufficient school accommodation; "a school-place for every child, and every child in its place," as Mr. Forster said. And for fifty years, or more, before 1906, each Education Minister annually boasted of the steady increase in available accommodation and the steady increase in the number of scholars; but now for three years the number has been steadily diminishing! Owing to the growth or movement of the population, a new school is required, the local authority hesitates to build one, the Board of Education does not press them, but sanctions all kinds of intolerable expedients for overcrowding the existing schools, and for getting rid of scholars claiming education. Despite the increase in population, there has been an enormous decrease in the younger scholars, owing to the many thousands refused admission; there is a decrease in the elder scholars, owing to the many hurried prematurely from the overcrowded class rooms in order to make room for those who are in the street. If the normal rate of increase had continued, there would have been 400,000 more children in the schools to-day. The physical suffering and educational loss of this over-crowding and exclusion are disastrous.

Given a suitable building, the next duty of the administration is to staff it with suitable teachers. Many retrograde steps might be noted under this head; when, after a long dark Tory régime, we look for a step forward. For years we have clamored against the wholesale employment of unqualified teachers, known as "article 68." With characteristic slyness, the Board of Education has got rid of "Miss article 68" by giving her another name, and so a grievance which, by means of thousands of speeches by Dr. Macnamara and others, was just coming to be understood by the public, is relegated to that gloom of abhorrent technicality and wilfully created obscurity in which our educational administration is now worked. But under her new name of "Supplementary," the "article 68" grows in numbers, and now men are recognised as well as women. Failure to pass an examination has with cynical humor been added as another passport to the school staff. Amongst many which might be quoted one figure is quite simple, it is "in 368 schools, the head teacher is not certificated." As one step along the road to the distant goal when every teacher in the schools will be properly trained, a rule was made long, long ago, that at least the head teacher should be certificated. During the last three years the number of schools with non-certificated head teachers has increased by nearly one-fourth; meantime the market is glutted with certificated teachers seeking employment and finding none.

Given a suitable building and suitable teachers, the next elementary step is to gather and hold a constituency of suitable scholars. What signs of progress do we find here? I have already noted the hundreds of thousands of children squeezed into the streets in the congested districts; what of the principles of popular education which past generations of Liberals fought for? The Annual Report of the Board of Education shows that the number of departments containing half-timers have increased by nearly one-half in the last three years; that higher elementary schools make no progress; that evening schools are neglected and "urgently demand attention."

These are only a few simple examples of many that might be given showing that the great Liberal victory of 1906 has not penetrated the real mechanism of national education.

I must not occupy more of your space, but I could say much on the great subject of finance—expenditure with little to show for it going up by leaps and bounds. This is nominally under the control of the House of Commons, but for three years the Education Estimates have never been really discussed in the House of Commons; or I could say much about legislation, the main points of the Government Bills, those dealing with the "religious difficulty," have no doubt been considered by Ministers and Cabinets, and did embody what are supposed to be Liberal principles; but in the schedules and minor clauses where "mere details" are settled by minor officials, we find lurking all kinds of reactionary proposals; whilst such small Bills as have scrambled through the House of Commons, such as the Education (Local Authorities) Bill, the Local Authorities (admission of the Press) Bill, the Education (administrative provisions) Bill were all mauled behind the scenes by the Board of Education officials.

We even sigh for the days when Sir William Hart Dyke was Minister for Education. There was nothing "heroic" then, but there was plain, honest, straightforward administration, loyalty to traditions, clean statistics and reports, and slow but certain progress. The last ten years of Tory rule broke through nearly all the established traditions and methods, both in local and central administration, and three years of Liberal Government have barely left a mark upon it.

May we still hope?—Yours, &c.,

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Those of us who favor the Secular, or, as I prefer to call it "the Civic," solution, will not be shaken in our view by the facts related by my friend Mr. C. E. Maurice in his letter to you of the 16th inst. What do they all amount to? That, by excluding theological teaching from the compulsory subjects in the schools, to which the children are compelled by law to go, we shall not "eliminate the signs of sectarian and ecclesiastical bias of the teachers."

Who but Mr. Maurice thought we should? Our aim is not to stifle the expression of honest thought in teacher, child or parent, but, on the contrary, to minimise the temptation which, under existing conditions, leads the teacher to suppress or disguise his true opinions for fear of losing his chance of promotion.

"No test for teachers," say the Government, and they forthwith require them to teach Cowper-Templeism. Why was Dr. Temple grateful for being left "so much alone"? Surely, because he objected to being subjected to religious tests! Therein is the key to the situation.—Yours, &c.,

W. WESTBURY PRESTON,

December 20th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—An outstanding feature of the history of elementary education in this country is the loss which has accrued to the Church of England from the compromise of 1870. Mr. Gladstone stated in Parliament that it was unjust for Church people to have to pay rates to maintain Board Schools, and in addition to have to maintain their own schools. Instead, however, of taking his stand upon principle, he based his action upon compromise; and the fruit we see to-day in the millions of Church children in the late Board and present Council schools who have been denied their birthright to be taught their faith.

The experience of the past should be a guide for the present. No arrangement based upon expediency will be a permanent settlement. Circumstances change, and what may be thought expedient now may prove to be inexpedient a few years hence. On the other hand, principles which are just do not change. The diminishing number of Church schools, much as it may be deplored, does not affect the main issue. The Church's demand for justice is based not upon the number of her existing schools, but upon (1) the principle that parents, being compelled to send their children to school, have the inherent right to determine the character of the religious instruction, and (2) the principle that as all equally contribute to the taxes and rates all are entitled to equal treatment. —Yours, &c.,

S. E. Dymott.

St. Bridget's Vicarage, Liverpool,

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Many aspects of the Education question will come up before we get a settlement.

The Irish Church requires a great deal, it does not follow that Irish parents and Irish scholars require the same thing. For example, I was driving out with an Irish priest in the West of Ireland,—he was very candid. We began talking of the miserable condition of the children, and he said, and seemed to mean it, "Ah, Mr. Southern, we must get among the children, or we'll never mend the parents." He was not dressed in the uniform of his calling, and, if I met him casually, I should not have known him for a priest. At the moment, we were driving past a small loch, which looked promising for sport. We pulled up, and I threw out a few experimental casts. Whilst so engaged, a gossoon, about ten or eleven years old, approached us, wading the dangerous margins of the Tarn with frequent pullings of the forelock—he was very kind in pointing out good places, "Now, Sorr, just cast over behind that bush, I have seen a great big trout there the other day." Meanwhile, my companion, forgetting the absence of his clerical garb, said, "Phelim, how old are you?" "Ten, yer honor." "What school do you go to?" "The Convent school, but I don't lose much by not being there, for they teach you nothing but masses and prayers."

This, however, is merely a question of money, the property which now supplies the emoluments of the Dean and Chapter of Manchester was violently wrested from the Roman Catholic Church, although two Royal Decrees had affirmed their rightful possession, and many similar violations have occurred elsewhere. We can afford to be generous in respect of minor matters.

It seems to me that the example of Canada shows a way out of the difficulty, where the ratepayer is charged with all the rates due from the hereditament, and there is then a column on his rate note for any allowances, one of which would be the school rate, which would be handed over to the Catholic official body, to spend as they like; the same would be done with other denominations. What is wrong with this system? Why should it not work with us? I had a letter a short time ago from a member of the Canadian Ministry—with whom I have occasional correspondence—relating to the working of the system, and asking his opinion, which opinion greatly impressed me. I further discussed with him the difficulty of dealing with small denominations, and his reply was: "There were no difficulties." If there were not sufficient members of a denomination to warrant them having a school of their own, they went to the municipal schools, and in a big city like Quebec, they would have large schools, the one side Protestant, and the other side Catholic, and thus ensure the religious teaching of each particular sect, whilst at the same time a friendly feeling manifests itself in the playground, where the children mingle.

Doubtless among your many readers, there will be some who could tell us what are the arguments of objectors; objectors there must be—"What is the use of us appointing you to go to the Synod, Donald, you are no speaker, you know." "Ah, mon, but I can objeck."—Yours, &c.,

"THE ISSUE FOR LIBERALISM."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In your leading article of last week, "The Issue for Liberalism," you state, "the question is whether the Liberal Party is prepared to fight the battle of the Constitution, or to encounter dissolution in a far more complete and final sense." With this there are probably few Liberals who will not agree; but, surely, it is in the highest degree necessary that the Liberal Party should "choose the ground" on which the struggle with the House of Lords is to be fought. If the party goes to the country, as you recommend, after next year's budget, on this question, practical men will consider in giving their vote that they are passing judgment on the House of Lords for the rejection of the Licensing, Education and Scottish Land Bills, and in England the verdict will probably be one of acquittal, in Scotland of condemnation. It can hardly be contended, in view of recent by-elections, that the Licensing Bill is popular. Is it not rather the case that as the Local Veto Bill was largely the cause of our undoing in 1895, so now the Licensing Bill of this year would occasion our downfall? Scotland surely affords proof of my contention that the issues, on which the House of Lords are to be fought, must be carefully chosen: there is no Licensing Bill to alienate public support; on the other hand there are the Land Bills which appeal strongly to popular sentiment, and the result is seen in the practically undiminished strength of the Liberal Party at the polls.

There are, therefore, I venture to submit, strong grounds why the Government should continue in office for another two sessions Assuming that in next year's Budget Mr. Lloyd George will reduce the Sinking Fund by four millions, he will, in all probability, only have to find, to finance the Old Age Pensions scheme and provide for the falling off in revenue, a sum of four or five millions in fresh taxation. With a graduated income-tax and high licence duties, it is not unreasonable to assume that an additional eight millions might be raised; there would thus be a balance of three or four millions, which might be devoted to State insurance against unemployment. Supposing the Government in 1909 to rest content with a Budget of such importance, and with the introduction of a Poor Law Reform Bill, which might also be protected from the Lords' action by being made a money bill, I contend that that year's session would greatly strengthen the hold of the Government upon the mass of the electorate. With no Autumn Session in 1909, full time could be given to the preparation of a far-reaching scheme of Land Reform, and a really democratic Reform Bill.

The House of Lords would, without a doubt, reject or mutilate both these measures, and the Constitutional issue could then be submitted to the country on questions commanding a large amount of public support.

There are other advantages to be gained from this policy from the electioneering point of view; adequate time would be allowed for the proper administration of the Small Holdings Act, while the removal of the Chinamen from South Africa would have been completed.

If, however, the Government stays on, and devotes its time to measures such as Welsh Disestablishment, which, like the Licensing Bill, appeal only to a section of the electorate, while stimulating prejudice and arousing opposition of the fiercest kind among great masses of voters, then, indeed, the Liberal Party can only face a General Election with the certain foreknowledge of defeat. Not only will the battle with the House of Lords be lost, but a Protectionist Party will be in power, and our Free Trade system on the way to destruction.—Yours, &c.,

SUFFRAGIST TACTICS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The paragraphs in last week's Nation on Woman's Suffrage are disheartening reading, if they are to be taken as an expression of the general attitude of thoughtful and democratic men. It would, no doubt, be unreasonable to expect the majority of men to understand the militant suffrage movement, or to rate it at its true value, but one would have hoped that a newspaper which sympathises with struggles for freedom by nationalities and native races, and by victims of industrial oppression, would realise that women's enfranchisement belongs to the same category of questions, and should, therefore, receive the same unswerving and energetic support. When crimes are committed in India, you, sir, do not express calmly the belief that such occurrence will wreck India's hopes, but, on the contrary, urge reforms; nor, when riots by the unemployed take place, or when strikes issue in free fights, do you say that labor questions are put back fifty years. What are women to think when you fear that a democratic House of Commons will not now support a Suffrage amendment, while at the same time you do not make any scornful comment on the weakness of conviction and character which M.P.'s would show by such a betrayal of our cause?

Irritated resentment on the part of politicians cannot stand against unlimited self-surrender, determination, enthusiastic comradeship, and a noble appeal. The underlying motive of the whole suffrage movement is the desire for freedom—the same kind of freedom which has always appealed to the best men. We look anxiously for an answering response to women's aspirations to awake amongst men, not only out of a chivalrous understanding, but because they recognise that their own freedom and power are bound up with women's.

One realises more and more how strangely unconscious men are of the galling position of subordination, tacitly accepted, which has been assigned to women. The legal and customary dependence of women on husbands or fathers for money is demoralising and stunting to the character of women of all classes. In addition, amongst the wage-earners, it leads to an amount of suffering unknown to the outside world. Equally damaging is the mental subordination, which affects nearly all women's activities. It is always assumed that the views of a wife should be those of her husband. The other day a married woman said to me it would be the end of all peace at home if she took up the suffrage question. An apparent peace is continually gained at the price of killing the woman's mental life.

In public work we see that women are welcomed, if its object is to advance their husbands' positions or the causes their husbands' support. The claim women are now making is that they should have the right to enter public life not as appendages, but as independent individuals. They also claim that they should be as much welcomed in serious and important work as in their present occupations of acting as hostesses in Liberal social parties, or tea-makers at co-operative and labor gatherings, or stall-holders at Church or Nonconformist bazaars.

While innumerable women are patiently enduring the "authoritative methods" of men, others are beginning to break down restrictions. Such remarkable though little known pieces of work as Miss Hobhouse's among the Boer women, or Miss Mona Wilson's legal presentment of the case for the Pottery workers at the inquiry before Lord James, show that it is only opportunities that women need to excel in unusual fields.

The Suffrage movement creates and gathers up the daily growing demand for freedom in every direction, and concentrates it on the fundamental question of the vote. We appeal to men to appreciate and respond to the spirit of freedom and progress which is moving women. The forces of long-inherited prejudices and inertia are so tremendous that it is no wonder such suppressed force should vent itself in temporary action outside ordinary standards. It rests with men to decide whether this reform—so great because of the aims it represents and because of the direct and indirect results to be achieved by the vote—will be gained without more of those terribly painful scenes that have already occurred. The Liberal Government has a glorious opportunity. Is it possible it can be untrue to all its professed principles, and ingloriously let it pass?—Yours, &c.,

MARGARET LLEWELYN DAVIES.

[Miss Davies seems to us to confuse two questions. She argues with us as to the desirability of the suffrage. The only point to which we addressed ourselves was the effect on the average male politician of a special form of tactics adopted by a section of women suffragists, mainly based on intimidation. As an illustration of the working of these tactics we quoted not our opinion but that of the most distinguished friend of the suffrage in this country. Is not such an opinion of some significance as a test of the general working of the suffragette methods?—ED., NATION.]

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Surely Mrs. Vaughan Nash takes rather a narrow view of the demand for the vote "on the same terms as men." Since marriage is not a disqualification for men, no form of franchise under which women were disqualified by marriage would really be the same thing as the present franchise for men. This fact has been recognised in the Bill read a second time in the present House of Commons and passed by a large majority. The only thing which women can logically demand is to be enfranchised "on the same terms as men," but since men vote after marriage, as well as before, that demand implicitly carries a claim that women should do the same.—Yours, &c.,

WOMEN'S WAGES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am not an economist, and like most people who are not specialists, I have to take my data at second hand. To support my statement about the decline of women's wages, I believe I might appeal to Mr. Sidney Webb's histories of labor. But I founded it on passages like the following, from Miss Clementina Black's "Women in Industry" (Duckworth, 1908, p. 33):—

> "Wages are not only inadequate, they are actually falling in many industries, yet so great is the pressure of necessity that workers dare not resist reduction, since there are always competitors ready to 'do it for less.' In a series of interesting examples of reduction furnished in the chapter on 'Employment and Wages,' in Mr. Howarth and Miss Wilson's admirable social study of West Ham, we find a jacket maker who used to get 17s. 6d. a dozen fifteen years ago now gets 5s. 6d. a dozen for exactly the same work. Another tailoress, who has worked for forty years at her trade, is receiving 2s. 6d. a dozen for her coats and 2s. 6d. for reefers, where ten years ago she received 5s. a dozen from middle men for exactly the same kind of garment, and yet another, who has worked for over thirty years for one firm, is being paid 6½d. and 7½d. for waistcoats which used to bring her in 1s. 4d. each."

Yours, &c.,

HENRY W. NEVINSON.

December 9th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. H. W. Nevinson, in a letter published in your issue of November 21st, spoke of a law recently passed in Finland which equalised the wages of men and women. This desirable consummation has not quite been attained yet, but he was probably thinking of the regulation of 1907, touching the pay of school-teachers under Government. By this, in all country schools, unmarried male teachers and female teachers receive equal pay; town schools, being managed by their Communes, are variously regulated.

There is a strong movement here in favor of equal wages for men and women, which is, naturally, greatly assisted by the presence of women in the Landtdag. Your readers may be interested to hear that just such "practical uses" as those enumerated by Mr. Nevinson, e.g., the improvement of laws concerning paternity, marriage, and the custody and protection of children, formed part of the programme for the past autumn Session of the Landtdag in Finland.—Yours, &c.,

THE SPEECH OF THE PROVINCE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I think that those who have written to you on this subject have omitted to notice that there is—or, perhaps I should say, was—a very clear rule as to the sounding or not sounding of initial h. It was silent in words directly derived from the French. We still omit it in "hour," "heir," "honor," "humor" (though in this there is a growing tendency to sound it). My grandfather (1780-1871) never sounded the first letter in "herb," "hospital," and other words of the same class. This is, of course, only a rough and ready rule; but it will generally work out. In the sixteenth century the h in such a word as "inheritor" was not sounded; I have seen it written "inerter" in a letter of the time.

The fortune of the initial h has been various. Italian has now dropped it; but continued to write it for long after it had ceased to sound it. French has ceased to sound it—for even the so-called aspirated h only serves to affect the liaison—but writes it still. Spanish has partially ceased to write it, but does not sound it. With us, on the contrary, the tendency is, as has been said, to sound it more and more.

I daresay some philologist has gone into the whole story; but I do not know where to look for it.—Yours, &c.,

December 14th, 1908. A. J. B.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I be permitted to send a few words of reply to Mr. John Sargeaunt's remarks on such usages as "an harmonium"? I think the subject opens up an important question which is usually ignored. The usage is, of course, historical; but it is not so very long since "an" was used before all words beginning with h, such as "an hundred," &c., and there seems no doubt whatever that the only reason why the n should linger in "an harmonium" with some speakers is the phonetic incapacity of the Southerner to tackle the h in an unaccented syllable.

What is "classical pronunciation," or the usage of "the best people," would be difficult to define, but the rule given by Mr. Sargeaunt is disregarded by a very great many good speakers and writers, some of them Londoners. Two examples may suffice: I have always noticed the contrary usage in the speech and writing of one of our best pulpit orators, born in London and educated at Oxford. Tennyson does not countenance the "an"; for example "and we roar'd a hurrah." There are about two hundred words in English that would be doomed to irregularity by the old-fashioned (?) rule, and I would ask Mr. Sargeaunt if he actually says "an humane action," "an humiliating answer," or "an hyena."

But, as I have already remarked, this small matter opens up a far larger question, which ought not to be ignored by any who love our noble and simple English tongue, namely: Is it desirable and is it possible to control or direct the growth of our language? I for one think that it is extremely desirable that all phonetic developments should be curbed which tend to introduce arbitrary rules or irregularities, or to cause loss of precision in our simple grammar and our rich vocabulary, and that we should foster any tendency which would make our grammar more regular, or add precision to our words. One instance will illustrate my point. The decay of the final r in Southern English has brought into our language the enclitic r, like the liaison which is such a blemish in French, and we have to say "fa(r) from him," but "far away"; by analogy many people go further and say "idear of," and even "drawring"—all a clear loss to the grammar of our language, which rarely modifies the form of a word without a good logical reason. Unchecked phonetic decay of this sort may gradually bring down a language to the condition of modern Irish, in which the article and other qualifying words cause mutation of the initial letters of following words in an arbitrary and entirely useless way, much to the detriment of the language. But however desirable it would be to control or direct the phonetic decay of our language, I repeat that it is quite useless to attempt to do so until we follow the advice of our philologists and adopt a simplified spelling.—Yours, &c.

"WHAT IS LOVE?"

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is permissible not to know that there is in existence a play called "Ingomar, the Barbarian," by Maria Lovell.

Parthenia has given herself, as hostage for her father, into the power of the barbarian, to whose questionings as to how love comes and what it is, she replies in flamboyantly romantic language, which he finds beautiful but understands not.

She then recalls a song her mother sang, "an ancient song," and repeats the first two verses, which run thus:—

"What love is, if thou would'st be taught,
Thy heart must teach alone,—
Two souls with but a single thought,
Two hearts that beat as one.

"And whence comes love? Like morning's light,
It comes without thy call;—
And how dies love? A spirit bright,
Love never dies at all!"

She begins the first line of the third verse:—

And when—— but memory fails her and she can go no further.

Those who are learned in the by-ways of literature will probably be able to assign its proper place to the above version at the same time that they settle the chronology of the German, and of the French, versions, printed respectively in your issue, of the 28th November last, and of the 5th instant.—Yours, &c.,

Poetry.

PROLOGUE

Spoken before a performance of "Samson Agonistes," by Mr. Poel's company, at the University of Manchester, on December 19th.

"Is it indeed, O Milton, to profane
Thy art, and merit thy austere disdain,
If we have dared once more to disarray
The shadows of the Limbo, where he lay—
The ghostly Limbo of the Upper Shelf,
Thy Warrior Samson, half a ghost himself—
And into the broad day to lead him forth?

Not to afford a pagan people mirth
We loose him from his bondage; but to call
Into the very presence of us all
Thy spirit whom we honor, Poet dread!
But to become the voice thro' which, being dead,
Thou speakest, and before our very gaze
To stand, the Titan fall'n on evil days;
On whom the soul of England in her hour
Of need first calls; who, vanquisht, bringest power;
Whose ruin builds us, and whose bonds set free!

And what tho' grey, and bare, and rugged be
This last great chant of thy austere old age;
Tho' rare the purple splendor on the page;
Tho' the young magic of thy Dorian flute,
And thy consummate organ-peel, be mute;
Thy autumn has its music too! The roar
Of waves that heave and tumble on the shore
Sounds in thy giant pacing; and across
That deep ground-tone in tumult surge and toss
Scorns, exultations, agonies, despairs,
Undying angers, unavailing prayers,
Clash of vain arms, and shriek of shunless doom,
Defiance hurled undaunted from the tomb;
Then one heaven-rending shout, and one dread cry,
And Samson glorious in his agony!

Poet, who in thy autumn days couldst still,
Eyeless, with slaves, in Gaza, at the mill—
Thy hero so heroically sing,
Was it indeed thy autumn—or thy spring?"

MIRABEAU.*

Mr. Tallentyre's "Life of Mirabeau" is an interesting account of a career on which it would, perhaps, be difficult to write a book that was not interesting. There is nothing very profound or new in its analysis, and the only criticism we have to offer on its historical side is that we think it a little underrates Mirabeau's debt to the men whose brains he used, Dumont, Lamourette, Pellenc, and the rest. The style of the book, however, is more open to complaint, for the excitement of the subject seems more than once to have destroyed the self-control of the writer. Some pages are composed almost entirely of sentences broken up with dashes into little jerky parentheses, and some of the sentences get into a skein which it is quite difficult to unravel. "That in the present instance the Government rewarded him by nothing but refunding the expenses of the publication by the promise of a post, is most likely true, but is not the question. That both now and hereafter, turns, not on if Mirabeau was paid, but if he was paid for lying or for speaking the truth." A few sentences like that give the strongest intellect a headache. Another irritating and favorite trick of style is illustrated in this sentence, "For flowers he had ever a bizarre love—or rather, a love which was not bizarre at all, but considering his passionate reverence for anything lovely and simple that his own character most lacked, was natural." This particular construction, which is useful enough in its own time and place, occurs no less than three times on the page from which this sentence is taken.

Mr. Morley has contrasted Burke's good sense in overlooking Fox's private irregularities with Lafayette's reluctance to see France saved by a debauchee. The comparison between Fox and Mirabeau is inevitable in any discussion of the period. They were born in the same year. In both of them great powers, commanding views, and generous sympathies were largely spoilt by personal escapades that scandalised contemporary society. Mr. Morse Stephens finds a close likeness in their oratory. But there was one respect in which their careers offer not a similarity but a contrast. Fox had a father who did not know how to say a stern word to his son, and Mirabeau had a father who did not know how to say a kind one. Of the quarrels of the Mirabeau family, which filled France with their echoes, the noisiest were the quarrels of father and son. The family itself was never at peace. "These people will have to have a Secretary of State to themselves," said Maurepas on one occasion, and, as Mr Tallentyre points out, a family which had taken out sixty lettres de cachet necessarily occupied a good deal of the time of the Government. There was, indeed, one moment when the old Marquis had every single member of his family under lock and key. If the central power had destroyed the government of the nobles in France, it was exceedingly obliging in attending to their domestic quarrels; and it is easy to understand from the history of the Mirabeaus how it happened that little villages had to wait for many years to get the Government sanction for the restoration of a crumbling church tower.

Mirabeau himself learnt much from his boyhood of imprisonment and disgrace, and, among other things, he learnt his belief and skill in artifice and stratagem. It was not to be expected that a boy of genius and high spirit should be very scrupulous about his method of dealing with a father whose chief anxiety for his son was that he might be hanged under somebody else's name rather than live to be broken on the wheel under his own. Mirabeau became a most accomplished intriguer. Some of his tricks, like the anonymous letters he wrote about himself, recall Pope's labyrinthine ingenuity. On the other hand, it is difficult to believe that he really took his father in, when, in the hope of escaping from his prison, he affected a sudden admiration for his tedious book on political economy. In some ways he was singularly ingenuous, as in the ostentatious display of wealth and splendor which followed his subsidies from the Court. But the main effects of his youth were two. He learnt a duplicity which in the end often overreached itself, and he acquired a habit of reckless self-indulgence of which he was the slave to the end of his life. He was not a drunkard, but his brother, Tonneau, remarked apologetically that drunkenness was the only vice Gabriel had left for him. If Mirabeau had been able, like Fox, to free himself from his dissolute passions, he might have survived the overwhelming strain of his double life and his gigantic intrigue. As it was, he was called upon to face a physical ordeal that would have taxed a constitution of iron, and he could not check for one moment the profligate courses that were destroying his strength. His life was not, in point of fact, more disorderly than the lives of certain other Revolutionary politicians with whom some of the nice natures that shrank from Mirabeau co-operated readily enough, but there was no man whose ambitions could so ill afford his vices.

Mr. Tallentyre remarks that Voltaire and Mirabeau were the two great representative Frenchmen of the eighteenth century, and that Voltaire was the last great man of the old order, and Mirabeau the first great man of the new order. In the mêlée of the Revolution, old France and new France were both represented, and the most powerful combination the world has even seen was that of Talleyrand, the finished product of the old order, with Napoleon, the portentous product of the new. Mirabeau belonged in reality to both. His training was in the curious civilisation which, if it left men of public spirit and ambition as Julie de L'Espinasse said, fretting and chafing like caged animals, developed the enlightened propaganda of the Encyclopædists and a certain humanitarian zeal that was common to the finer minds of England and France. In Romilly's amusing description of the encounter in 1785 between Mirabeau and Wilkes on the English criminal law, it is the French rake, who was out of politics, and not the English rake, who was in them, that came off the better. Men of genius and energy excluded from the use of power were driven to use their minds in other ways, and Mirabeau's political career began with the pamphlets he wrote to beguile the tedium of his prison. His great gifts of phrase-making, of dramatising a situation, of borrowing and plagiarising, as Romilly said, from avarice and not from poverty, his clear and long-sighted views owed something to the circumstances that had forbidden him the practice and shut him up in the contemplation of politics. Those circumstances had made him fight with his pen, and at the very beginning of the Revolution he seized the importance of the Press. It was his prompt brain that gave the deputies of the Third Estate their organ, and when the Government suppressed the "Journal of the States General," he simply changed the title to "Letters of the Comte de Mirabeau to his constituents." He conducted his newspaper as he had conducted his love-letter writing, on the principle that, if somebody else had said something that was good or striking, it was merely false shame to refuse to borrow it, and unnecessary to make acknowledgments.

What, of course, distinguished Mirabeau from the philosophers and economists of the old order was his belief in the efficacy and importance of popular institutions. He clung to the monarchy, and would have gone almost any lengths to save it, but he wanted also to see France in possession of a great governing assembly. He never fell, like some of his frends, under the spell of the English oligarchy. In the most desperate crisis he never thought his own order could save France. He summed up the problem in 1790 as the problem of reconciling public liberty with royal authority. The monarchy he believed in, not on sentimental grounds, but simply because it had been so long the centre of the French system that he thought it was easier to adapt it to the new conditions of France than to find any other. It was not till 1792 that Danton, who had grasped no less clearly than Mirabeau himself the importance of setting up a centre somewhere in the midst of a chaos of magnificent abstractions, resolved that the monarchy was hopeless. The fate of Mirabeau's own experiment was settled when Mirabeau died. Could it have answered if he had lived? His ideal was sketched in his "Forty-seventh Note for the Court." Hereditary monarchy with a representative government that was to take the place of the National Assembly and to preserve to France all the free institutions which the National Assembly had given her. But the means to be taken to obtain this end showed how desperate the prospects of success were become by the winter of 1790. The King and Queen were to act with discretion; the National Assembly was to be made to discredit itself and to be lured to its ruin, and all France was to be honeycombed with secret agents and clever mercenaries. The plan which Defoe submitted to Harley in the pamphlet discovered a year or two ago was to be employed on the most lavish scale. The corruption which Walpole applied to a Parliament was to be distributed over a nation. Mirabeau himself might have carried out that part of the programme which concerned the National Assembly; means might have been found to establish a system of universal corruption and espionage. It would not have been a very happy foundation for the system of free government that Mirabeau desired, and its capital weakness was that in a moment when the nation was at its best, braced and inspired by the solemn ideals and religious hopes of the Revolution, Mirabeau proposed deliberately to poison its soul. That was a crime against the light which can only be called diabolical. But formidable as was that part of the scheme, the other was scarcely less difficult, for if Mirabeau could have succeeded in teaching the National Assembly to be foolish, we may doubt whether even with his consummate arts he could ever have succeeded in teaching the Court to be wise.

THE HISTORY OF HODGE.*

The annals of the poor at work on English soil are neither short nor simple, and no writer of our own has yet had the courage to grapple comprehensively with them. The omission, as Mr. Sidney Webb here reminds us, is only one more instance of our national neglect of that scientific study of past developments without which our statesmanship must continue to be, as it has been, an affair of short-sighted makeshifts and leaps in the dark. In default of native effort, the author and translator of the present volume have done good service in amplifying and completing Professor Hasbach's history and rescuing it from the twilight of its original German. Dr. Hasbach is brought thereby well into the circle of those distinguished foreign writers—Professor Vinogradoff, Dr. Redlich, and the rest—on whom we are compelled to rely currently for a good deal of our best information about English matters. In some respects his foreign outlook is a help. He is always so acutely alive to the strangeness of English agricultural ways. As Mr. Webb puts it: "Though other communities may have, here and there, landowners who are agriculturists only as rent receivers, farmers who are nothing but capitalist entrepreneurs, and proletarian agricultural laborers, no other nation but our own has left practically the whole of its agriculture to the pecuniary self-interests of such a combination of classes. Nor has it always been so in England." Nowadays we have come to take Hodge for granted. Dr. Hasbach makes no such mistake; he approaches him as a wonder-compelling phenomenon, the explanations for which must be carefully sought and tested.

English society as it sprang from the Dark Ages resembled that of Western Europe at large. There were slaves, serfs, farmers, nobles, and a king. No exact point can be marked at which slavery disappeared; the great transformation in the status of the serfs or villeins flowed mainly from the Black Death in the middle of the fourteenth century. Till then they were peasant smallholders, a self-supporting and not a wage-earning class, but bound to render servile services to the lords of the manors. Amid the social changes following the great pestilence these services became impossible to exact, and servile labor gave place to wage-labor. Yet even wage-labor was rather the exception, and a large proportion of the wage-earners did not live by wages alone. Much of the arable land was cultivated in common fields; much of the pasture was common also; while the gap between the cottager and the nobleman was bridged by an infinite gradation of small and large "yeomen" and independent farmers. What put an end to this system were the two movements, parallel but distinct, called "enclosure" and "engrossing"—i.e., the conversion of common land into individually owned land, and the rolling together of small farms into large. This process began under the Tudors, soon after the obsolescence of villeinage. The proletarianisation of the rural workers which then resulted is attested by the sermons of Latimer and by the poor-law of Elizabeth. Next comes a sort of pause, during which their material prosperity partly recovers itself, and reaches a sort of climax under Walpole. Following that comes the period of the "new enclosures," roughly coincident with the long reign of George III., when enclosing and engrossing both proceeded at full gallop, with the economists who believed in modernising production hallooing them on; with a steady rise in rents and a rise (till Waterloo) in the cost of provisions and the profits of large-scale farming; with the headlong proletarianising of the laborers, driven from their soil by the farming interest and driven from their cottages by the landlords, crowding into the towns to be fuel for the new manufacturing industry or festering in the "open" villages, the victims of typhus, cholera, and an insanely maladministered poor-law.

English agriculture, then, differs historically from that of West Europe, in that, first, the laboring elements shook off serfdom much earlier, and that, later, this emancipation from the servile burdens of the manorial system was followed by a loss of those material advantages of which it gave a share to all. In short, the English rural workers were the first to become free, and the first to become proletarians; and they became the latter with a completeness not elsewhere attained. In the eyes of Arthur Young (at least in his earlier period) and of the Georgian economists generally, the change was justified by increased national production. It might be painful, as transitions are, but it was a movement upward. Dr. Hasbach denies the increased production. With arguments similar to those ably marshalled by Dr. Slater in his "English Peasantry and the Enclosure of the Common Fields," he attacks Young in front, and tries to show that though the new system got more rents and profits out of the soil (and was therefore pushed by landlords and capitalist farmers), it got a far lower yield of products, besides supporting far fewer people in comfort. It is at least clear that so far as Young's argument rested on facts and figures, his statistics were such as would not pass muster to-day. But statistics for the old production are still harder to get. We are told, for instance, that in many districts most poor families kept at least one cow. They did not sell the milk, and so no figures exist of its sales; but the children had it, and had plenty. Whereas under the new system, for the past century, milk is almost unprocurable by the village poor; few poor children, either in town or country, have any of it worth mentioning; and admittedly the fibre of our nation is seriously weakened thereby. Such a reflection suggests how much, after all, may be urged on behalf even of a clumsy and antiquated system of "production for use" against our accepted system of production for profit.

Dr. Hasbach gives about half his book to the nineteenth century. We begin with the pauperisation of the laborer, the fall in prices after the Napoleonic wars, the unavailing attempt to stem the fall by Protection. Then comes the new poor-law; and the period of its extreme rigors, coinciding with a high corn tax and the increasing substitution of women's and boys' labor for men's, is one of nethermost misery. In the middle of the century we get, especially in the Eastern counties, the "gang" system, against whose worst evils philanthropic legislation had to be passed. From 1842 onwards the atrocious housing conditions in the villages (so fiercely exposed in Kingsley's "Yeast") began to be studied, reported on, and in some degree mitigated in the name of public health. In the last thirty years of the century came the great agricultural depression, against which the large-scale farmers in England fought so much less successfully than the small-scale farmers abroad. Yet in spite of it the laborers' wages rose, simply because their exodus from the country out-distanced the diminution in demand for their services. The exodus was powerfully stimulated by two new factors—elementary education and the deliberate emigration policy of the agricultural unions. The rapid rise, zenith, and fall of these unions is very fairly described by Dr. Hasbach; and he ends by tracing the movement which succeeded them and which is still on trial, the movement for small holdings. With this last he has very deep sympathy—a sympathy which probably colors some of his views, though in the main his book gives one a favorable impression, not only of its careful learning and skilled digestion of facts, but also of its impartiality.

Excavation is not a word that commends itself very warmly to the interest of the public at large. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred it means a work undertaken by specialists for specialists, not a work that has any very discernible connection with modern life and modern thought. The digging up of a Babylonian city out of its mound of mud may cast, as we excitedly say, "a flood of light" on the fiscal regulations of Khammurabi, or the disinterring of a Nile temple may, in a similar way, illuminate for us the reign of Amunurcit-Thor. It is the fashion when these old records are brought to light to talk and write as if we had all been waiting with bated breath for their resurrection, but the truth is that as the life they refer to has no bearing whatever upon the present they cannot have a very real hold upon our regard, and our first rapturous greeting quickly subsides into indifference. With one, however, among ancient races the case is quite different. Directly the archaeologist or excavator touches anything Greek he touches what is for us a living object. It is no question of our transporting ourselves back into a long dead period and working up, by concentrated study, an interest in an entirely alien race of people; our answer to the Greek appeal is spontaneous and instinctive. We recognise it instantly as having a claim upon our natural sympathies, as bearing a message which we can receive and assimilate. Between Greek civilisation and our own there exists the powerful bond of a similarity of intellectual ideas. The Greek point of view is our point of view and all the Greeks said and did interests us not as students, but as living men and women. Moreover, this interest is enormously enhanced by the further fact that Greek intellectualism was able, from its very clearness and simplicity of aim, to express itself with a wonderful power and completeness in terms of art. In short, the Greek not only has something to say that comes home to all of us, but he is able to say it with a beauty and vivacity which always insure on our part a delighted attention.

Therefore the word excavation has, or should have, a quite different meaning when applied to Greek things, from what it has when applied to other people's things. Instead of being a matter which concerns students, it is a matter which concerns everyone. This is one chief cause of the importance of Professor Waldstein's book on "Herculaneum." Its subject, the remains which lie hidden there under the mud and ashes of Vesuvius, is of genuine concern to civilised society. It is, in truth, a real buried treasure, a treasure of which the specimens already extracted prove the value, though we have no means as yet of determining their number and extent. On this point, Professor Waldstein, without pretending to dogmatise, has some very suggestive remarks. He advances reasons for believing that "the artistic treasure to be found, and the intellectual harvest to be reaped, in the thorough excavation of Herculaneum will be greater and more valuable than in any ancient site," including such sites as Athens, Rome, Alexandria, and all those of Asia Minor, Italy, and Sicily. His reasons for holding this opinion are briefly as follows: In the first place the inundation which overwhelmed Herculaneum was sudden and complete. Time for flight there was, but there was no time (nor thought probably in that scene of blackness and terror) for the removal of furniture and possessions. Just as they were, in all their completeness of detail, knicknacks, and art treasures, the houses were hermetically sealed up, and that by a substance not violent to shatter and break, but semi-liquid, that entered and rose quickly and clasped with almost intentional carefulness each object in turn. Thus, so far as has been discovered, each object remains in its place undisturbed, and the busts and statues still stand balanced on their pedestals in the embrace of the solidified composition which was once liquid mud. Yet this strange substance, so delicate in its handling, has been the most stubborn of guardians. The depth to which Herculaneum was covered has insured that no light and pilfering hand can force an entrance. Its rival, Pompeii, scarcely concealed, and that with ashes, has been ransacked repeatedly. Its own inhabitants, there is every reason to believe, returned immediately the catastrophe was over and removed their own household effects, and almost every house, since those days and long before our time, has, it would appear, been visited and looted. But with Herculaneum it was different. What the mud took the mud kept. The tentative experiments which from time to time have been made in excavation allow us, perhaps, to judge of the quality of the buried treasure, but the body and bulk of it remain in all respects as it was on that fatal day, eighteen hundred and twenty-nine years ago last twenty-fourth of August, when the city was originally entombed.

We can scarcely, then, fix any limits in our imagination to the stores of classic remains which, in all human probability, are here awaiting disinterment. Not only may we expect to find treasures of art but of literature also. "All the great Greek tragedians or writers of comedy (including Menander) may be there waiting for us in their completeness. The works of the early Greek philosophers, Heracleitus, Parmenides, Empedocles, Democritus, Anaxagoras, and all the treasures of thought only known to us from fragmentary lines in later writers; the missing works of Plato and Aristotle (what would one not give to see a complete "Poetics"?); the whole of Roman literature, the lost books of Livy—one hardly dares to allow one's imagination to roam in these dazzling fields of classical light. Nor is it impossible that we may find contemporary records, letters referring to the rise and early years of Christianity. All this seems to await us." But if the harvest is of such extent, the labor and expense of reaping it are on a similar scale. No one nation could be expected to provide the funds, the labor, and the expert knowledge necessary to the carrying out of so gigantic a task. Probably the reader is familiar, in outline at least, with the solution of the difficulty proposed by Professor Waldstein. With the able assistance of Mr. Leonard Shoobridge, he had elaborated a vast scheme for the excavation of Herculaneum on international lines. For a time all went well with this scheme. Kings, Presidents, statesmen, ambassadors, scholars, professors, and artists of all nations were infected by his eloquence, energy, and knowledge of his subject. The plan he had in view, framed with great tact to avoid in any degree wounding the amour propre of Italy, and insuring to her the control of all operations and the retention in perpetuity of all objects discovered, secured apparently the full approbation of the Italian Government. The King of Italy was to be head of the International Committee. Professor Waldstein visited Germany, France, America. The French and American Presidents consented to preside over the French and American Committees. The German Emperor undertook the same office in his own country. All difficulties appeared to be overcome. Promises of help and co-operation poured in from all sides. It is not too much to say that the imagination of the civilised world was deeply and genuinely touched by a scheme of such real import to civilisation's best interests. On December 5th, 1906, a dinner at which the representatives of the chief Powers were present, was given to the Italian Ambassador in London to celebrate the triumph of the international undertaking.

We have not space here to deal with the petty and regrettable causes which, for a time at least, have brought these fair promises to nothing. They seem to have been due to a certain irritability of Italian patriotic sentiment, really unreasonable under the circumstances, since Italy's dominant and proprietary rights were carefully guarded in the provisions of the contemplated arrangement. On these misunderstandings Professor Waldstein forbears to enlarge. His tone is of the most perfect courtesy and good temper throughout. Evidently it is his conviction that sooner or later the international plan will be reverted to and he is careful to say not a word that can delay that hoped-for end. In the meantime Italy has declared her intention of setting about the business herself, and has set apart a sum of £600 for the work of excavation which Professor Waldstein had estimated could not be effectively carried on for less than £40,000 a year. It is evident that no very great results can be looked for from operations on so insignificant a scale, and we must all of us share Professor Waldstein's hope that by and by Italy will come to view the matter in a less prejudiced light, and, in the prosecution of a work of such great and universal interest, will welcome, under her own superintendence, the assistance of other nations.

JOHN RUSKIN'S IRISH FRIENDS.*

We opened this book with keenest expectancy; we have closed it after careful reading with profound disappointment. We knew the name of La Touche mainly in connection with that of John Ruskin; we expected this book to be largely concerned with his delightful personality, providing, perhaps, fresh passages in that pathetic but always interesting love story, a love story which Mr. Ruskin did not hesitate to discuss with us himself. Alas; the less congenial field of politics takes our attention in this collection of letters, to the blurring of any other impression.

Miss Margaret Young, who gives us these "Letters," was governess to Mrs. La Touche's grandchildren for some years, and became one of her most intimate friends and correspondents. Mrs. La Touche and her husband belonged to the landed class in Ireland. They had an estate at Harristown, Co. Kildare, and from the marriage of Maria Price to John La Touche, in 1843, until the death of the latter, in 1904, the pair lived largely the life of a county family in Ireland, varied only by holidays in Dublin, London, and Mentone.

It was in London, in 1858, that Ruskin became acquainted with Mrs. La Touche and her two daughters, one of whom, Emily, married Major Ward in 1866, and died two years later, while Rose died unmarried in 1875. Here is Miss Young's view of the Ruskin love episode. It is not borne out by Mr. E. T. Cook's account in the thirty-fifth volume of the Library Edition of Ruskin's Works. She says:—

> "Rose's friendship with Ruskin has been so much discussed and written about—giving much pain to those members of her family who survive—that very little need be said here. Ruskin was ever an educationalist, and even in that rôle he made mistakes. The idea that he cared for her in any other way than that of a master for a pupil, does not appear to have dawned on anyone's mind—least of all on her father and mother—till matters had gone far. Rose did not want to marry Ruskin, but her parents could not bring her to see that continuing her friendship with him was encouraging his misplaced hopes."

Mr. Cook makes it clear that Rose was not, at times, disinclined to marry Ruskin, and that she wrote him many, many love letters; the evidence that he brings forward shows plainly, we think, that any irresolution that the girl of eighteen may have felt towards uniting her life with a man of forty-seven, even when that man was her much revered teacher, must have been fanned and intensified by the attitude of her parents, and particularly of her father, who was under the domination of Mr. Spurgeon, and saw everything through the medium of the Metropolitan Tabernacle. In that world Mr. Ruskin was an "unbeliever"; he who, more stalworthy than any other, had kept aloft a spiritual banner in an age of materialsim. The La Touche romance ended tragically by the girl falling more and more into a morbid religiosity which killed her in 1875. It says much for Mr. Ruskin's greatness of mind that in later years, he renewed his friendship with Rose's mother, and we have here some very human correspondence between Mrs. La Touche and Ruskin in the 'eighties. We quote one sentence, referring to his articles in the "Nineteenth Century.":—

> "I was writing to Knowles yesterday about some more fiction he wants; and told him I should rather like to say a little more, soon, because now that George Eliot was in heaven, I could write her epitaph without any chance of meeting her afterwards."

But there is all too little about Mr. Ruskin in this book, and all too much about the writer's views on Ireland and Irish questions. To call Mrs. La Touche a noble woman is to misuse words. True nobility implies a capacity for seeing and feeling beyond and above one's environment. The lady whose letters are given here was simply a good woman of the conventional type, with the ideals of her circle. She was a cousin of the late Judge O'Connor Morris, and shared his views. She believed with him that the Land League was an atrocious institution, and that:

> "the truest and 'rightest' reports about Ireland, and the wisest opinions, are to be found in the 'Times.' We in Ireland are so thankful to that paper for its honest and faithful work in showing England the bare truth."

Many pages are devoted to diatribes against Irish Nationalism and Mr. Gladstone. Mr. Ruskin might have taught Mrs. La Touche a finer outlook on the Irish question had she not had too great a contempt for any English view. In 1886 Ruskin wrote to the "Pall Mall Gazette"—

> "In your recent articles on the Irish question you have taken no notice of certain peculiarities of the Irish race which I imagine you know as well as I do, and yet, by unlucky chance, you hitherto ignore them! Would it not be well to take some account of these following ineradicable virtues of theirs in our schemes for their management? First, they are an artistic people, and can design beautiful things and execute them with indefatigable industry. Secondly, they are a witty people, and can by no means be governed by witless ones. Thirdly, they are an affectionate people, and can by no means be governed on scientific principles, by heartless persons."

NOVELS OF THE HOUR.

The familiar proverb about the fool and the angel would be truer if we put the young in the place of the fool: "Youth rushes in, where angels fear to tread." Thus amended, the proverb is exemplified in the case of Miss Dorothy Senior, whom internal evidence seems to proclaim young, and whose novel, "The Clutch of Circumstance" (A. & C. Black, 6s.), is greatly daring. Her personages belong to the period of the Round Table, her story closely resembles that of Tristram and Iseult, and she has boldly introduced one of the most attractive figures of Malory. Dinadan, that delightful knight, who not only thought but said that "two or three" adversaries were enough for one man at a time, and who continually scouted the follies of men in love, has in Miss Senior's pages given his name to an ordinary young gentleman. Our dear old friend, Dinadan, was, as we are all sure, a lean man, of no great stature, dark haired, with a lively, observant, dark eye. Miss Senior's Dinadan is fair, freckled, blue eyed, and long in the leg. He is also noticeably youthful, which the real Dinadan can never have been, even in boyhood. The fair Dinadan falls in love—as he might do—with a perfectly empty, kittenish, apple-blossom girl. Our Dinadan, like Benedick, who was certainly of his race, would never have fallen in love till he met a Beatrice, his equal in wit and in character. No; this rosy youth is a mere changeling. But so, for that matter, is the refining and moralising Finola, who from a sense of duty returns to the brutal husband who has insulted and ill-treated her. A woman on the level of the legends might kill herself, or fly with her lover, or retire into a convent; she might emphatically not return voluntarily to a degrading bondage. Miss Senior has failed where probably not the greatest writer living could have succeeded. But then, the great writer would have known better than to try.

Mr. Max Pemberton has no doubt a public ready to accept his spasmodic style, his mechanical puppets, and his total lack of simplicity. To read his latest novel, "Sir Richard Escombe" (Cassell, 6s.), which, as posters on many hoardings have informed us, appeared originally as a serial in a Sunday paper, is a penance for any person who cares for literature; and there are moments when such a reader becomes hopelessly disturbed by the trick of invariably coupling certain epithets with certain names. If any provocation could excuse the crimes of underlining and of marginal vituperation it would be that given by the writer who hangs a label round the neck of his personage, and persists in reading it aloud in our ears. We long to say: "Yes, yes, Mr. Pemberton, we know that already. This is the sixth time you have said 'the

Of the real, breathing, and incognisable Ireland that lies obscured from English eyes behind the mists of the "Irish question," there have been no interpreters so shrewd, so understanding, and so revealing as the ladies who write under the names of E. Œ. Somerville and Martin Ross. They are as indispensable to the study of Ireland as is Mr. Dooley to the study of America, and their earliest, or one of their earliest, books, "The Real Charlotte," stays in the mind as the most pitiless picture of Irish rural life that has yet been drawn. Their later and better-known volumes, such as "Some Experiences of an Irish R.M.," "Some Irish Yesterdays," and "All on the Irish Shore," fall in artistic seriousness considerably below the level of that remarkable effort. In them the authors are rather playing with their subject than analysing it; but their play is so deft and nimble, their touch so sure and light, that it seems churlish to complain if their feet no longer choose the ruggeder paths. And even when the range they have imposed upon themselves seems most limited, even when it hardly goes beyond the kennels and the hunting field, it is impossible for them to resist the happy, illuminating side-light. They know Ireland and her people and the strange, unimaginable impulses that sway them both too thoroughly to make their stories, for the English reader, nothing but stories—to be able, that is, to exclude from them the touches that lay bare the verities of local life and character and instinctive ways of looking at things. Merely as tales their clean, crisp workmanship and flowing humor are a delight, but the uninitiated Saxon may find something more than pleasure in the glimpses they allow him of the intimacies of the Irish mind and nature. In their latest volume, "Further Experiences of an Irish R.M." (Longmans, 6s.), their skill is as buoyant and engaging as ever. We meet a number of old friends, the R.M., Flurry the omniscient, Philippa still untamed, the indisputable Mrs. Knox, Mrs. Cadogan, most Irish of Irish cooks, Slipper, that appealing reprobate, and many others, whose company has lost none of its beguiling relish; and we make some new acquaintances in the McRorys, Gweeneen the Sprat, and the Brickleys, who step at once into our cherished regard. Their adventures and friction, plots and counter-plots, form a series of stories and sketches worked out with a finish and freshness and in a vein of visualising humor of which these authors alone among the Irish writers of to-day seem to know the secret. They can be recommended as excellently amusing reading. They can be still more highly recommended for the light they throw on much that makes Ireland so peculiarly Irish.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

The literature of our cathedrals and abbeys has claimed many followers. Mr. Thomas Scott Holmes, however, who has written a volume on Wells and Glastonbury for Messrs. Methuen's "Ancient Cities" series (4s. 6d. net), can hardly be said to belong to their ranks, though his work deals, to a great extent, with the ecclesiastical establishments for which Wells and Glastonbury are famous. It is less the story of the cathedrals that he passes in review than that of the cathedrals in their relationship to the towns that derived their beginnings from them. The interdependence of church and city is plainly shown in these pages. In its origin the city of Wells was entirely ecclesiastical. The Anglo-Saxon church there was raised to cathedral rank as early as 909, which is to say more than two centuries before the nucleus even of a town was formed, and for a long time after that the townsmen were but dependents of the bishops who owned the soil. It was not till 1559 that the town obtained its charter of independence from Queen Elizabeth, and thereby finally threw off the shackles of ecclesiastical domination. Glastonbury Abbey derives much of its interest from an antiquity unequalled by any other place in England, and from the Celtic legends that impart a peculiarly romantic mystery to its ruins. The real history of the town, however, does not begin till the eighteenth century, the charter of its incorporation being granted by Queen Anne in 1705. As a town, therefore, it is of less interest than Wells, though the fascination of its Abbey is quite unique. An excellent feature of this book is the itineraries, and Mr. E. H. New's drawings in the manner of old woodcuts add to its usefulness and make its embellishments.

In a "suggestive" little volume, "Ruined and Deserted Churches" (Elliot Stock, 3s. 6d.), Mrs. Beedham opens a page of ecclesiastical history which we trust she or some pious antiquarian may treat, at some future time, at greater length. Her ten chapters dealing with Destroyed Churches, Early Christian Oratories, Ruined Churches in Norfolk, Guild, Wayside and Chantry Chapels, &c., are filled with records of departed greatness, of social vicissitudes, of the encroachments of changing fashions, and of human neglect, records the more romantic in their appeal to us because all are attested and duly authenticated. We read of fonts turned into pig troughs, of towers pulled down to mend the roads with their flints, of Priories of the twelfth century now used as barns, of chancels now deep in turf, of elder bushes in fruit on the site of Communion tables, of the floors of naves and isles covered with growths of ivy, rose of Sharon, snowberry and ribes bushes. Every page contributes some curious illustration of parish history. Thus it is known to few that the waters of St. Katharine's Docks flow over the site of an ancient Collegiate Church and of St. Katharine's Hospital, founded by Queen Matilda in 1148, and that as late as 1825 the church, the residence of the Chapter and houses accommodating 2,550 people were in existence. Mrs. Beedham writes in a pleasant and unpretentious style, and her thoughtful little volume should find its way into the hands of the large public that is interested in Church history.

"Folk-Lore in Lowland Scotland," by Miss Eve Simpson (Dent, 3s. 6d. net), covers a very wide field of research in an eloquent, if somewhat precious, style of writing. In the two first chapters, dealing respectively with the custom of Beltane and the Water Wells, supposed to be endowed with special properties, we have the proofs of the early recognition and deification of the two elements of fire and water; while succeeding chapters treat of kelpies, pixies, and other off-shoots of the fairy tribe, with the superstitions relating to fishermen, flowers, and birds, with some notorious witches and wizards, and with the ancient ordering of "Fairs, Festivals, and Funerals." Much of our folk-lore, like our other sorts of wisdom, came from the East. The Romans and Scandinavians enriched it; Christianity helped to perpetuate it by adapting many pagan beliefs to the purposes of the new creed, the process of these astute compromises offering a most tempting field for inquiry. Some of the superstitions related in this volume—such as that of the "first foot" on New Year morn—are not now associated exclusively with Lowland Scotland, since they survive for some distance south of the Tweed; but one must make allowances for the change that has taken place in the geographical boundary, and the Lowlanders can, at any rate, claim two festivals, those of Hogmanay and Hansel Monday, that are peculiar to themselves. The book contains many quaint and curious oddments.

We cannot wonder that there is something perennially interesting about our great administrators and soldiers in India. It so happens that the qualities most admired by English people were conspicuously displayed by nearly all of them. We mean the qualities of courage, honesty, and condescension to inferiors. The heroes of our Empire in India have been our ordinary squires and our ordinary officers, raised to an almost preternatural "power." They were the healthy, well-bred Englishman, as it were, transfigured, and it was especially the intense crisis of the Mutiny which called out our best essential qualities; often our worst as well, but certainly our best. That is why the British tourist in India may see nothing whatever of Indian life, but never fails to mourn or exult over the poor, crumbling relics of Lucknow and Cawnpore. The familiar story has now been told again, first by Mr. Frederick Gibbon ("The Lawrences of the Punjab," (Dent, 4s. 6d.), and then by

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."—MORNING LEADER.

Mr. G. D. Oswell ("Sketches of Rulers of India": Vol. I., "The Mutiny Era and After"; Vol. II., "The Company's Governors"; Clarendon Press, 2s. each volume). Both books are well done, and would be useful to young fellows going out to India in any of the Services. Mr. Oswell has the greater knowledge of the country, and also the wider and finer theme. His "Company's Governors" seems to us the most interesting of the volumes, partly because the story is not so worn, and it takes us back to times when the old States of India still existed, hardly touched by the levelling hand of England. It includes Clive, Hastings, Elphinstone, Thomas Munro, for whom the temple bells of Madras still ring a special chime of gratitude, and one or two others less well known. Unhappily, both volumes, especially the Mutiny, are written in the old-fashioned Anglo-Indian spirit of ascendancy and Imperial domination that the Indians themselves now connect with Lord Curzon's name. Perhaps English people know it best through Mr. Kipling. It is a spirit that finds its natural scope in recalling the glories of the Mutiny days, but we wish someone could invent a new way of telling that old, old story.

"Within Four Walls" and "Children at Play" (Unwin, 5s. net) are two three-act plays by the Hungarian dramatist, Leo Sarkadi-Schuller. Both pieces belong to the "problem play" class, and both are strongly impregnated with Ibsenism. The second is perhaps the stronger in its situations; the difficult and delicate problem it debates is, moreover, treated with due restraint. In the other the character of Gabor, the half-priggish, half-hypochrondriacal youth who plans to die from an inherited consumption and is ultimately blown up in a mine explosion, would alienate the sympathy of the average English audience; though the mother, who sacrifices her good name in her son's eyes in order that she may cure him from the dread of his inheritance, belongs to noble drama. The plays are good reading, and in the hands of sympathetic interpreters might prove good acting.

One of the best volumes of a series that is rapidly making its way to the front is Mr. J. J. Foster's "Chats on Old Miniatures" (Unwin, 5s. net). Mr. Foster is one of a group of serious students of miniature painting, and he writes authoritatively and with enthusiasm on a branch of art that has always made a strong appeal to collectors. The origin of miniatures is somewhat difficult to trace, but one is safe in saying that it was "monkish," and that the beginnings of the art are to be found in the illuminated MSS., "Books of Hours," &c., wrought by the unknown craftsmen of the ninth and tenth centuries. The portrait miniature is, of course, of much later date. Hans Holbein is credited with being the founder of miniature painting in England, and, to begin with, its practice was, as in ordinary painting, virtually confined to foreigners. But the seventeenth century saw the rise of a national school of artists, prominent among whom were the Olivers and Samuel Cooper, while in Georgian times, Richard Cosway and Ozias Humphrey kept the art alive. Mr. Foster has an interesting chapter on the enamel painters, including the Petitots, and his review of the miniatures shown at the exhibition of eighteenth-century works of art, held at the French National Library in 1906, gives an instructive résumé of Cosway's French contemporaries. Miniature painting holds an unique position among the arts in regard to the artists it has attracted. Not only were there famous painters, such as Holbein and Raeburn, who practised it, but also numerous cripples, whose physical handicap was so great as to seem startling. Thus Sarah Biffin and W. Carter, both of whom were without either hands or feet, painted miniatures, and, what is more, achieved a fair measure of success. A description of the miniatures to be seen in our royal, private and public collections, concludes usefully a book that the collector will find more than usually sound and readable.

Mr. J. E. Phythian's study of "Burne-Jones" (Grant Richards, 2s. net) is as catholic and ingeniously reasoned a piece of criticism as one would expect from the author of "Fifty Years of Modern Painting." The artist was essentially a literary painter in that, like Rossetti, he took his inspiration from books, and this appreciation of his work is largely from the literary standpoint; we read a great deal of what Burne-Jones intended to convey in his pictures and comparatively little about their actual painting. It is in accord with the writer's contention that Burne-Jones cannot be judged by the ordinary standards of artistic skill that he criticises the matter-of-fact criticism of M. de la Sizeranne. At the same time Mr. Phythian contrives to be just, as well as generous, to his subject; and his estimate of him as a man who, though a dreamer, could yet take a sane view of the realities of life is amply justified by the facts of his biography. Mr. Phythian adds no facts to those already known; but Burne-Jones's character, his aim in art, and his Socialistic tendencies, are clearly shown by contrast with those of his great contemporaries, Watts, Morris, and Rossetti, and the book is not difficult reading. It contains thirty-two illustrations.

"What and Why" (George Allen, 2s. net), is the sufficiently comprehensive title of a short philosophical treatise by Mr. Shaw Maclaren, the aim of which is to show the futility of narrow specialisation and the necessity of looking at the nature of each of the three faculties—the physical, the rational, and the moral—whereby all human knowledge is gained. The author discusses the Senses, as the first great instrument of knowledge, the Reason as the second, and Analogy as the third; indicates the essential difference between the knowledge of physical and that of non-physical subjects, arriving finally at "the ultimate finding and bedrock of philosophy—that there are three various sorts of knowledge, each differing from the other, in kind, in nature, and in method of attainment." The line of thought is closely followed throughout, and the book may be commended for a quiet half-hour.

The Week in the City.

Christmas finds the City in fairly good spirits. The outlook in the Near East has improved, though not sufficiently to induce any great speculative movement. The expectation of higher prices is supported by various evidences of a trade revival; but this, on the other hand, will go against a cheap money market, and low rates for money are considered to be the best basis for a speculative boom. The Bank of England's reserve is now rather low, and seems likely to remain so, at any rate until after the appearance of the Russian loan, which is expected soon after the middle of January. The Sao Paulo Coffee loan has been a great success. It has reimbursed the bankers, put an end to the dangerous purchases of coffee, and at the same time it should prove (if the coffee held as collateral is judiciously and skilfully disposed of) to be the best secured and the best supported of all the Brazilian loans. I believe that the Canadian Government will be in the market before very long.

A Memorable Debate

and Mr. Lloyd George, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer.

In a debate in the House of Commons, on the 13th June, 1890, on the Local Taxation Bill, Mr. Gladstone said, "Enough of idle words; if you were to multiply these amendments till they were as thick as the leaves in Vallombrosa, or as plentiful as the advertisements of you would not prevent the consequences of this clause." And in the same debate, as the Pall Mall Gazette reported, "Mr. Lloyd George, the new Member for Carnarvon, made a capital maiden speech, full of promise for his future career."

This was eighteen years ago, but tributes to the popularity of Pears' continue to appear in an ever-broadening stream. It is 120 years since Pears' was invented, and it still remains the leading toilet soap of the world—first in purity, first in beautifying properties, first in point of economy and first in public favour.

The highest possible honours at the leading International Exhibition since 1851 (including the only Grand Prix ever given for a Toilet Soap) have been awarded to Pears.

Diary of the Week.

IN the space of less than a minute, at 5.20 on Monday morning, a slight shaking of the earth-crust in the earthquake zone of Southern, and particularly South-Western, Italy sufficed to slay more than 100,000, some accounts say 240,000, people, and to shatter scores of towns and hundreds of households in irretrievable ruin. The shock seems to have passed from Catanzaro, in Mid-Calabria, down to the southern coasts of the province, laying low towns and villages as it went. It crossed the Straits of Messina into Sicily, almost wiping out two lovely and famous towns, Reggio and Messina, on either side. The still more beautiful Taormina, which looks down on one of the most exquisite pictures of coast and sea in the world, though shaken, has been spared. The sea-floor of the straits was altered, and huge waves were flung on to either shore. Messina and Reggio have been reduced to heaps of tumbled and blazing ruins, beneath which lie buried the greater number of their citizens and the luckless strangers within their gates. Between them the forces of earth and water, having wrecked these habitations of men, isolated them, cutting off railway and telegraphic communication, and destroying or deforming roads and harbors. Reggio seems to have been deprived for two days of any human succor. In Messina only the Archbishop's Palace and two banks have been left intact. Cathedrals, churches, hotels, barracks, town halls, have shared the general ruin, and priests, monks, generals, governors, doctors, foreign officials, have been buried with them. Whole families have disappeared, but no accurate tale of loss can as yet be disentangled from the heaps of corpses. Frenzies of despair and superstition seized on the people. Some ran thirty or even fifty miles from the scene of the ruin. Others went mad, and rescuers were shocked by the wild, strained faces and bleeding wounds of the survivors.

CONSIDERING how near and how awful the catastrophe has been, and that the loss of life exceeds that of any recorded earthquake—in the Calabria earthquake of 1783 only 30,000 people perished, and at Lisbon only 60,000—the newspaper reports have been singularly scanty. The King of Italy, at once sympathetic and personally brave, broke up a shooting party as soon as he heard of the disaster, and hastened to the stricken cities. Both at Messina and Reggio he aided the work of rescue. The monarchs and peoples of the civilised world have united in sympathy and material help, and with us a Mansion House Fund has very properly been opened, to which the King has subscribed 500 guineas and the Queen 250. But the life of the whole province has been disorganised, and years must elapse before even the very modest well-being of Southern Italy can be restored. As we write, we hear the appalling news that the Lipari Islands, the volcanic group lying to the north of Sicily, of which Stromboli, an active volcano, is a part, have disappeared with all their inhabitants. The rumor comes through an Italian newspaper, and is supplied by a Marconi message.

THE scheme for giving a modest measure of help with honor to humble old age came into force yesterday, January 1st. The percentage of applicants for pensions to the whole population of people over seventy was 54 in England, 56 in Wales, 60 in Scotland, and 128 in Ireland, where there was obvious fraud—these figures showing a very large body of dependent poverty. The total number of claims received was, in round figures, 690,000: that of persons recommended for pension 490,000. The number of people excluded after investigation was 42,000, and over 100,000 claims are still under consideration. London has sent in 41,000 claims, 32,000 of which have been admitted, and £8,000 was paid out on the first day of the new year. In Manchester and Salford over 6,700 people made good their claims.

THE Indian National Congress meeting at Madras, on Monday, relieved of the extremist element which disturbed the Congress of 1907, has passed a unanimous vote of confidence in the Morley scheme, its "dominating note," says Reuter, being "unbroken gratitude" to its author. The tone was strongly loyal, the President, Dr. Behari Ghose, insisting that the scheme reconciled order with progress, while Mr. Bannerjee, who moved the resolution, claimed that all sections of Nationalists, as well as all the provinces and nationalities represented at the Congress, accepted and acclaimed it. On the other hand, the Congress asked for the repeal of the deporting Ordinance of 1818, approved of the Swadeshi movement, cheered the names of the deported Bengalis, and specially pressed for an undoing of the partition of Bengal as the condition of a successful career for the reform movement. The Mohammedans, through the All-Indian Mohammedan Conference and League, while they accept and welcome the principle of self-government, are asking for a purely Mohammedan register of electors for the colleges, and will probably want more representation on the Councils than the scheme gives them. The Anglo-Indian Press is generally favorable, and it is noteworthy that the "Times," which has hitherto ignored or satirised the National Congress, now speaks approvingly of it.

M. Isvolsky has made his speech to the Duma, and Russia has published her Circular Note to the Powers, and both leave no doubt that Russia must share with Austria responsibility for the prolongation of the Balkan squabble. Russia prevented a direct settlement between Austria and Turkey by insisting that the whole question should come before a Conference, and now she has compelled Austria to assent to a general discussion between all the Powers, which puts off both a settlement and the meeting of a Conference to the Greek Kalends. Yet M. Isvolsky had to admit that Russia, of all Powers, was least qualified to put a spoke in Austria's wheel, seeing that she long ago pledged herself by treaty to give Austria a free hand in Bosnia. Russia's purpose is not the defence of Turkish interests nor, except in so far as it will strengthen her own influence, the securing of "compensation" for Servia and Montenegro. Her objects are twofold—to get compensation for herself and to entrench her hegemony among the Slav States of the Balkans. The Turkish Cabinet will not, we hope, stiffen its demands. Bulgaria has offered Turkey between three and four millions sterling. It is quite certain that the Turkish finances cannot be reorganised except on the basis of a higher tariff, and that Bulgaria cannot afford to give more than she has offered. But so far Turkey has not made even a motion of agreement. After all these months of negotiations a settlement is as far off as ever, though time presses and delay is most dangerous. The "Temps" may well write bitterly of this melancholy failure of European diplomacy.

The Turkish Parliament is getting through the inevitable preliminary work with speed and discretion. The Chamber has elected Ahmed Riza, the veteran Reformer who spent twenty years in working for a Constitutional Turkey, President, Talaat Bey, another Young Turk, first Vice-President, and Aristidi Pasha, a Greek, second Vice-President. The Sultan, who has theoretical liberty to select from among three nominees for each of these posts, has accepted the plain choice of the Chamber, and, to demonstrate his cordiality, has invited the whole Assembly to dinner, and undertakes to build a more worthy Parliament House. The majority, in testing the elections of members, have prudently refrained from pushing their powers to the extreme against unpopular representatives. Both Houses have passed an Address in reply to the Sultan's Speech. The Senate lays emphasis upon foreign policy, but the most significant passage in the Chamber's message insists upon the responsibility of the Cabinet to the Chamber, and the necessity for it to possess the Chamber's confidence. Both Addresses were passed practically without discussion outside Committee, and we shall see revealed their inner meaning and the true attitude of the Parliament towards the Ministry when the Government's foreign and home policy is discussed. This important discussion will probably be begun before the end of the week.

The weather in the British Isles broke abruptly after Christmas, and a sharp frost was followed by one of the heaviest falls of snow ever known in an English December. London has rarely been so enveloped with snow. Aberdeen and other Scottish towns were cut off from the South from Monday night till Wednesday afternoon, and the Scotch express was embedded in the snow for twenty-eight hours. Tuesday was the coldest December day ever known in London during the fifty-one years for which meteorological records have been kept. The maximum temperature was 23·7 degrees and the minimum 18 degrees.

There is not the slightest attempt to conceal the wires which moved the puppets in the Venezuelan revolution. The United States tells the world that it appointed a Special Commissioner and sent warships at the request of General Gomez, and this before that gentleman had discovered Castro's plot against his life, or disclosed publicly his own plot against Castro's presidency. Holland, too, has got "satisfaction," and withdrawn her ships; the native monopolies are being abolished, and the foreign monopolies, which Castro had driven out in a sufficiently lawless and arbitrary fashion, are reopening their offices. The statement, however, that the revolution had been bloodless, was made too hastily, for on Tuesday a severe fight took place at Macaro, between the supporters of Castro and General Gomez's forces, in which the latter came off worse. All the news that comes to Europe is, of course, "doctored," and it is quite possible that Gomez's troubles with his own people are only beginning at the moment at which his troubles with the foreigner are ending.

A waiter named Mathis celebrated Christmas by taking President Fallières by his beard and knocking him down while he was out walking. Mathis turns out to be probably half-witted, a member of M. Biétry's yellow syndicate of blacklegs, and a fine flower of French Royalist culture. He looks upon his assault upon an old man as the accomplishment of his "mission," and the Royalist organ hails him as a hero, while the young gallants of the cause have seized the occasion for proclaiming their eagerness to put a bullet into every good Republican. They and Royalism have not for many years had so favorable an opportunity of getting into the newspapers, for even as Conservative a journal as the "Débats" had given up mentioning them. Every reputable person has condemned this blackguardism as heartily as it deserved, but plain men would like to know how far the Seine jury should be held responsible which acquitted the man Grégori, who shot Major Dreyfus at the Panthéon. If respectable shopkeepers could publicly proclaim such an outrage innocent, one can understand a pervert like Mathis persuading himself that it is a fine thing to assault the French President. Mathis's crime has probably suggested the firing of revolver shots at the windows of the room in the Place Beauveau, where M. Clemenceau was sitting. The assailant was a Corsican named Benedetti, who alleges a trifling personal grievance against the authorities. M. Clemenceau was not injured, and the attempt will probably improve the Prime Minister's political position.

The revenue returns for the nine months of the year exhibit results rather less discouraging than was anticipated. The last quarter shows a distinct slackening in the rate of decrease as compared with the returns for 1907—stamps, estate duties, and income tax all looking up. The net decrease for the nine months, allowing for the reduction of the sugar duties, is £2,842,000. The main source of shrinkage lies on the Excise, which has already fallen to the extent of £1,170,000. Mr. Asquith's estimate was that the returns for the whole year would only go down £220,000. The decrease is, of course, temporary; it will disappear as soon as trade revives.

Our Paris correspondent writes:—"The difficulties occasioned to the French Church by the policy of Pius X. are by no means at an end. Since the Pope has refused to allow the Church any legal status, and has even refused to allow Catholics to become tenants of the churches, their position in regard to the fabrics is very precarious. This fact has just been illustrated by the action of the Municipal Council of Châteaudun, which has refused to undertake the structural repairs of more than one of the three churches in the town. M. Briand, who has been appealed to, has declared the Council to be within its rights, as, indeed, is obvious. For Clause 5 of the Law of April 13th, 1908, while permitting the public authorities to provide for the structural repairs of the churches, does not compel them to do so. As the Law of January, 1907, which places the churches at the free disposal of Catholics, omits to require them to keep the churches in repair, it follows that this duty is imposed on nobody."

"This is a serious state of affairs, when the churches are (as in the case of Châteaudun) buildings of artistic value scheduled as historical monuments. It cannot be tolerated that such buildings should be allowed to fall into decay, but it is certain that, if the public authorities are called upon to keep them in repair, they will claim the right to use them as they please. Nor is it reasonable to ask that public money should be expended on the maintenance of buildings for the exclusive use of what is, in many cases, a very small minority of the population. At Châteaudun one church would probably be more than sufficient for the practising Catholics in the town; the Municipal Council naturally does not see why it should provide them with three at the public expense. There are hundreds of villages where the church-goers number from half a dozen to a score of the inhabitants. It is too much to ask the rest of the community to keep up a building for their benefit."

The American Amateur Athletic Union has suspended three American Olympic winners—Sheppard, who won the 800 metres and the 1,500 metres at the Stadium, Bacon, who won the 400 metres hurdles, and Porter, who won the high jump—on charges of professionalism. They are accused of taking exorbitant expenses. Hayes, the Marathon race winner, has, of course become a professional of his own will, so that four out of the 11 American winners at the Stadium have already lost their amateur status, while a fifth, Carpenter, has been suspended by the English Amateur Athletic Union. This sort of thing suggests uncomfortable reflections as to the purity of American amateurism in sport. Perhaps it would be more just to say that in every country where athletics is a popular amusement, and therefore a possible source of profit and temptation, the line of demarcation between amateur and professional tends to become very shadowy. One has even heard of athletic exhibitions at the older universities. The more immediate moral, however, is that international competitions like the Olympic Games which give the winner so excellent an advertisement must, whatever else they do, accelerate the transformation of the amateur into the professional.

The Christmas season has been brightened by a plausible, though fairly explicable, ghost story. On December 26th Mr. Brock, who was acting as locum tenens for Dr. Astley, the Vicar of East Rudham, in Norfolk, received a letter stating that the Vicar and his wife had been injured in a railway accident in Algeria. In the afternoon of the same day the housekeeper, a lady of seventy, reported to Mr. Brock that on going to close the shutters, she had seen reflected through the glass door of the study on to a wall outside the picture, not only of the study and its furniture, but of Dr. Astley himself. Mr. Brock then accompanied the housekeeper to the study, looked out at the reflected picture, and saw, as he said, the seated figure of Dr. Astley in clerical dress. The housekeeper described him as walking and vanishing into the outside wall. Mr. Brock stated that the vision was repeated on the following evening. A young maid also said that the figure of the absent Vicar was visible to her.

The "Times," hearing this story, sent a representative to East Rudham Vicarage. He was taken to the study and saw through the glass door the natural reflection of the study and its furniture, but no picture of Dr. Astley. The housekeeper, however, insisted that she saw her absent master quite plainly, while Mr. Brock was "not so positive, though inclined to think that the figure was there." It will be observed that the vision appeared most clearly to an old lady, who states that she was accustomed to see visions, particularly the form of her dead mother. But the clergyman's account was less positive, while the journalist, with the scepticism of his class, saw nothing at all. The subjective character of the experience is, therefore, very strongly marked. The housekeeper was predisposed to see ghosts. Her vision at seventy could not have been good, and her mind had recently been excited by lively fear for her master's life. These impressions threw themselves on the screen which nature had prepared, were transmitted, less strongly, to Mr. Brock and the maid, and not at all to the journalist.

Meanwhile, a final touch of discredit, so far as the suggestion of any non-natural or telepathic communications between Dr. Astley's personality and that of the inmates of East Rudham Vicarage is supplied by a telegram received by the "Times" from Mr. Muriel, the British Chaplain at Algiers, who communicated the news of Dr. Astley's accident. Mrs. Hartley's and Mr. Brock's account of Dr. Astley's appearance was that he was dressed in clerical garb, and that he wore a big gold chain across his vest, and that he was walking or sitting at a desk. All these points are negatived in Mr. Muriel's telegram. "Dr. Astley," it says, "is very much amused. At the precise moment of the alleged astral appearance, allowing for the difference of Greenwich time, Dr. Astley was not in clerical garb, wearing a gold chain, at a book-laden desk, but was quietly resting in bed in the hospital, conversing with me about his lost luggage." So that even Dr. Astley's thoughts were not turned to the people at the vicarage at the moment when they had their rather theatrical vision of him.

Politics and Affairs.

LORD MORLEY'S SUCCESS.

The news from India speaks, we hope and believe conclusively, of a success for Lord Morley's scheme comparable to that which Liberalism has achieved in South Africa. Here and there a detail of the plan may fail. It may be necessary, for example, as the "Spectator" suggests, to satisfy the leaders of the Mohammedans by adding a Mohammedan, as well as a Hindu, to the Governor-General's Council, and in that case Lord Morley's plan of nominating only one Indian to a vacancy will have to be modified. But, on the whole, it seems clear that a fairly representative body of Indian opinion has already decided to accept the plan mainly as it stands, and that our own Civil Service is prepared to work it. This intelligence largely outweighs the expected news that some of the extremists are in opposition. The reforms were hardly meant for them. Having thrown over the idea of British control of Indian destinies, they cannot welcome a proposal which aims at broadening and popularising the basis of that power. But few observers can have hoped that in the disturbed atmosphere of the last few years we should at once have struck so large an area of calm. Storm centres there still will be, for reform, while it satisfies some activities, violently disturbs others, and it is not in the character of the revolutionist to be content. And it is to be noted that even the purged National Congress at Madras, which opened with "God Save the King," and closed with cheers for the Monarch and Lord Morley, condemned the deportations, asked for the undoing of the partition of Bengal, and formally supported the Swadeshi movement. But, on the whole, we take it that two highly significant changes have come over Indian society as the direct and immediate results of the reforms. The first is that Anglo-Indian opinion has for the first time ranged itself alongside a moderate section of Indian politicians, and pledged itself to a large modification of provincial government and to a not inconsiderable infusion of Indian ideas into the central power. The second is that the Indian reform movement has become markedly constitutional and that we can henceforth treat it as we treat Liberals and Conservatives in Canada, or Deakinites and Laborites in the Australian Commonwealth.

Thus, we may fairly say, is wisdom justified of her children, and the great political difficulty, thrown upon Liberalism by the Renaissance of the East, and by our own support of the Turkish and Persian Parliaments on the one hand, and our refusal of the Parliamentary form to Egypt and India on the other, has been sensibly modified. For our own part, we do not follow Lord Morley's reservations as to the extension of the representative system to the peoples of the East. The despotic forms, which one Oriental country after another is now sweeping away, grew not so much from the political incapacity of the Eastern peoples as from the fact of an arrested development. Even to-day life in Constantinople seems to resemble the authentic pictures of life in London three hundred years ago. But it is clear that when we have placed the mechanism of Western civilisation at the disposal of Eastern peoples, they sooner or later decide to adopt our political institutions as well. It is no longer possible to maintain either the color-line or the geographical line in intellect. What Western State has ever undergone so quick a process of mental assimilation as modern Japan? Lord Morley himself, we are sure, would feel no sense of inequality of mind or temper in discussing Indian or Turkish politics with men of the type of Mr. Gokhale or Ahmed Riza, the Speaker of the Turkish Parliament. Even if the principle of self-government obtained a very moderate degree of success in its new spheres of influence, we, with our own tempered view of the value of pure democracy, will have no ground of reproach. In India we even have to confess that we have something to learn from the adaptive faculty of Oriental races. To this day the majority of the Indian Civil Service feels a nervous shiver when it parts with a fraction of its power and gives it into the hands of Indian officials. But long before his Liberal period the Turk had been willing to seek statesmen, diplomatists, and administrators from among Armenians and Greeks. At this moment the first Vizier under the Turkish Constitution is a Jew.

We shall, of course, be told that the Indian case stands by itself, and that we cannot substitute for the present system of undivided British control a sharing of power with native India. That is, we think, a rather question-begging statement. So far as external policy is concerned, we may never be called on to surrender our headship of India. But in regard to inner government, we give away something continually, and in native States like Mysore, planted in the very centre of our power, English subjects, with very large commercial rights and ambitions, have long been content to live under the rule of Indian statesmen and administrators. It is clear that a considerable system of provincial Home Rule will spring up under Lord Morley's plan, and one day we may find India prepared for a scheme of federation which would solve almost every political difficulty save that which the conservatism of a powerful governing corporation suggests. Would that be a bad solution for this country? Have we ever been so confident of our present tenure of power that we would not exchange it for a relationship with the home population comparable, though not identical, with that which unites the Mother Country to the self-governing Colonies?

But the question presents itself under another aspect than that of deliberate choice. Lord Morley, with great skill, has persuaded the Indian Civil Service that he is their friend, and at the same time has induced them to become the executants, we hope the willing executants, of a large devolution of functions to native India. But it is clear that no other policy was possible. Absolutism is sinking all the world over; the great anti-absolutist Power cannot retain it. All parties agree that the agitation for self-government is the fruit of our own educational system, and of the special ideas of polity which England taught at a time when her most persuasive thinkers were clearer about the value of liberty than they are to-day. To this intellectual stimulant has been added the visible success of Japan and the general revival in the East of which it was the signal. These forces will not diminish; they will be continually recruited and encouraged. But the great fact which makes for the concession of self-government to India is that while we are continually training candidates for a business the upper branches of which lie mainly in our hands, our own supply of specially skilled agents tends to fall off. Recent observers of the Indian Civil Service agree that we no longer send to India an adequate number of administrators, lawyers, engineers, of the ablest types. The demands of the home country and the rest of the Empire increase, and an Indian career no longer offers the special prizes which dazzled the eyes of young men of the mid-Victorian period. Young India has access to the best educational machinery that we can provide; and it seems doubtful whether, taking our University and public-school system for what it is, it now turns out enough governing ability to maintain the Indian Civil Service at its old standard of intellectual strength. What we yield, we yield to necessity, and we have no more reason than older Empires to quarrel with the law of politics that limits the possibility of governing great and widely separated dominions from the centre. We have rather to adapt gratefully and generously to the Indian case the lessons in devolution which our own experience in the Colonies fortifies, and to qualify race-pride with a more intelligent and a more profitable doctrine.

WHAT IS A FAIR WAGE?

THE latest official attempt to realise the admitted obligation of the Government to be a "model," or at any rate a "fair" employer, as regards the wages and other conditions of work in the contracts it gives out, cannot be described as satisfactory. A few months ago a Select Committee, sitting to consider the feasibility of securing a minimum wage in sweated trades, made a gallant endeavor to formulate a machinery of Wage Boards with legal authority to secure definite improvement in pay for whole classes of ill-paid home workers. The Report just issued is at once wider and narrower in its survey and its treatment. Confined to the subject of Government contracts, its reference extends alike to skilled and unskilled, organised and unorganised, factory and home workers. Since the five Departments taken into consideration give out contracts amounting to twenty-five million pounds a year, the labor issue that is involved cannot be regarded as a trifling one, concerning, as it must, the welfare of some hundreds of thousands of workpeople. If the Committee had been able to evolve any moderately reasonable definition of fair wages, or to recommend any method of ascertaining, assessing, and enforcing them for work done under public supervision and control, an important step towards the solution of the gravest labor problem would have been taken. It has, however, completely failed to do any of these things, and, in our judgment, the failure was foreshadowed from the nature of its reference.

Instead of being invited to re-open the whole principle and policy of the "fair wage," the Committee was fastened to the working of the slippery Fair Wages Resolution of 1891, which reads as follows: "That in the opinion of this House it is the duty of the Government in all Government contracts to make provision against the evils recently disclosed before the Sweating Committee, to insert such conditions as may prevent the abuse arising from sub-letting, and to make every effort to secure the payment of such wages as are generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen." Now, in well-organised trades where a strong trade union and a well-recognised standard wage exist, no great difficulty arises. There the trade union rate is usually the current rate, though even here the Committee objects to any formal recognition of the Union conditions. But in organised trades, where the Union, though existing, is not able to enforce its rate in practice, what is a "fair wage" to mean? As we understand the Report, the Committee finds that it is "the ordinary market rate." But this finding is, to our mind, a formal abandonment of all attempt to discover and secure a fair wage or to protect the workers against any other abuses in the conditions of employment. We agree that where the Union rate does not prevail in practice it cannot be taken as the criterion of fairness. But surely that does not involve the acceptance of a "market rate" which in the case of many male and nearly all female workers is, in effect, a sweating wage.

Equally unsatisfactory is the treatment of wages in unorganised trades. Here, after enumerating four widely differing methods of fixing wages, the Report merely recommends that "one or other" should be adopted, without designating any preference. The whole of the confusion and futility of the Report is attributable to two defects of procedure; first, the oscillation between the endeavour to find a "fair" wage and a "current" wage, with a latent assumption that the two are identical; secondly, the lack of the acceptance of any sort of test for "fairness." A fair wage may mean one of several things. For instance, it may mean a time or piece rate sufficient to provide a weekly wage of "subsistence" to a competent worker getting an average amount of employment. It may mean such a piece or time wage as the ordinary competitive employer can afford to pay, having regard to the normal rate of profit and to competition in the market. There are other principles, more or less defensible, for determining a "fair wage," upon any one of which some practical policy might have been based. But where no attempt is made to lay down a principle of fairness, it is impossible to expect a useful result to a discussion of rival modes of fixing wages. As the Committee rejects the trade union wage, without substituting any other intelligible standard, so, in regarding general conditions of labor, it rejects the trade union "fair house," without indicating what method it would employ to secure that only "good employers" shall be placed upon the list of contractors.

On the important question of women's wages we cannot affect surprise that the Committee still leaves unsolved an issue which has always bothered trade unionists, and upon which women themselves speak with divided voices, the issue of "equal pay for equal work." To many first approaching the question it seems as if it could be settled by a simple maxim of obvious equity. Why should a woman get less than a man for the same work, sex being thus made a ground for differentiation? This is the argument which first leaps from the lips of the advancing woman who wants absolute economic equality. But then comes the discovery that the rigid application of the doctrine may mean that, instead of women entering more freely into employments hitherto held as masculine preserves, they may lose a good deal of the employment which their acceptance of lower rates of wages has hitherto enabled them to get. For even in those few trades in which their average skill seems equal to or superior to that of men, as in those of teaching, type-setting, and certain sorts of commercial or clerical work, their attendance is less regular, and some other incidental disqualifications based on physical weakness lessen the net value of their labor. Though certain exceptional trades exist where male monopoly or prejudice is the excluding cause, it is certain that the rigorous application of the doctrine of "equal pay" would greatly reduce the field of employment for women wage-earners. Moreover, the equity of "equal pay" is not so obvious as at first sight it appears. For reforms in the distribution of wealth generally aim at payments based on needs rather than on mere output. Now, even if it be admitted that a woman has on her own account as many legitimate needs as a man, the actual normal situation of our family life throws upon the adult male a far larger share of the burden of supporting a family. So long as a man's wage is the chief basis of a family income and a woman's wage merely supplementary, it remains socially desirable that the man should earn the larger income.

If, however, the growing participation and aptitude of women for wage-work should materially alter the present economic structure of the family, this ground for differentiation may be modified. Even as matters stand, we hold that any wage-court or other Governmental tribunal for determining wages ought to be endowed with a discretion to make "equal payments" for the woman employees, wherever positive evidence is brought, that she does in point of fact act as the chief wage-earner in the support of a family. Some such discretion is essential to any really valid determination of a "fair" wage. But any such recommendation must have seemed Utopian to a body which took so mechanical a view of its functions as this Fair Wages Committee.

SIR EDWARD GREY'S OPPORTUNITY.

It is only a very buoyant optimism which could watch the interminable prolongation of the Balkan crisis without anxiety and foreboding. Five months of speech-making and negotiation and military preparation have brought us no nearer a solution, and the Conference to which European statesmen turned instinctively after the Austro-Bulgarian coup seems indefinitely remote. If it meets at all, it will only be to register results already reached by private bargaining among the Powers. The wish for reasonable conciliation which would make a bargain possible has nowhere as yet declared its presence. Neither between Turkey and Bulgaria, nor between Turkey and Austria, is there even a preliminary basis for agreement, and the Servians are still cultivating an irritable despair tempered by armaments and varied by explosive incidents. The most disquieting aspect of this situation is the mediocrity, not to say incompetence, of the diplomacy of nearly all the Powers, great and small. Baron von Aerenthal apparently cannot combine adroitness with vigor. The Turks, if they have displayed dignity and steadfastness, have also committed two capital mistakes—first in challenging Bulgaria through the Gueshoff incident, and then in reviving that original soreness by the stiff wording of the recent speech from the throne. As for the Bulgarians and the Servians, it is useless to criticise them, for it would be rash to assume that they really desire a peaceful solution—if they do, their means are ill-adapted to their ends. Russia and Italy stand together in a rather equivocal plight. M. Isvolsky and Signor Tittoni have not succeeded in freeing themselves from the suspicion that they were in some degree the accomplices of Baron von Aerenthal. They are nowhere trusted, least of all in their own Parliaments, and their present endeavour is to draw some incidental advantage from the crisis, while retaining their shaken positions at home and yet avoiding an open breach with Austria. Germany is manifestly anxious, tongue-tied and inert. She is embarrassed by the consequences of Austria's adventure, and supports Vienna rather from duty than from choice. The French, as usual, are nervous in a crisis which might develop into war. They are annoyed by M. Isvolsky's failure to share with them his guilty pre-knowledge of the coming crash, and embarrassed by the ardor and decisiveness of English sympathies. Popular opinion in France is with the Turks, but official opinion is dragged in other directions. It does not wish to offend Austria, for Austria might be useful in a second Moroccan conference; it regards Tsar Ferdinand, who is, on the maternal side, an Orleanist prince, as a protégé, and it is conscious that its financial aims have weakened its prestige at Constantinople. As for this country, our attitude has been, from the first, as frank as it is simple—we whole-heartedly second the Young Turks in the foreign difficulties which have been forced upon them, at a moment when the whole civilised world ought to have conspired to facilitate their task of reconstruction and reform. There is, in short, no Europe at this crisis, and there can be no effective concert.

Among the personalities who control this situation Sir Edward Grey is the only commanding figure. Baron von Aerenthal is masterful, theatrical, and fundamentally clumsy; Tewfik Pasha is a mere relic of the old régime of doubtful honesty; M. Isvolsky and Signor Tittoni are universally suspect; M. Pichon is a nullity; and Prince Bülow a witty and adroit balancer, involved in more absorbing preoccupations at home. Sir Edward Grey, enigmatic on the surface, merely because he is really so direct and simple beneath it, has undoubtedly achieved one-half of his purpose. He has made his protest on behalf of the idea of public law in Europe; he has also secured a future to Young Turkey by standing by her at the moment of her first shock and trial. The test of his statesmanship lies now in his ability to evolve from this chaos a constructive solution which will avert war. Without some legal settlement the unrest in Eastern Europe will know no end, and must ultimately seek relief in a war from which Turkey could hardly emerge intact, and in which her new Constitution would be put to an intolerably severe test. In the end it is, we believe, on Sir Edward Grey that the future depends. He alone can speak at Vienna with a single and fearless voice. M. Isvolsky must always hedge between a wish to respect secret treaties and to keep his position against a hostile public opinion. Sir Edward Grey alone is trusted and respected at Constantinople. From the very opening of the crisis the popular imagination envisaged it as a moral struggle between Britain and Austria, and in its crude way popular imagination was right.

Unhappily this country is handicapped by faults of temper which are habitual, and also by suspicions of more recent growth. The violence of some of our newspapers, more particularly the "Times," has needlessly envenomed the dispute. Our past relations with Bulgaria should have enabled us to exert a powerful restraining influence in Sofia; that asset was squandered by the brutality of a few leading articles. Nor is it wise or true to suggest that Austria is now acting as the tool of Germany. Some of Baron Marschall von Bieberstein's proceedings in Constantinople may have lent color to this belief. But it is contrary to the plain facts to suggest that Germany's attempts to manage the crisis have contained any provocative or Machiavellian element. This anti-German suspicion in London, the mere expression of an habitual jealousy, has now been answered in Berlin and Vienna by the counter-charge that we on our side are simply working out one of our now familiar manœuvres for the "isolation" of Germany. We aided, if we did not promote, the Turkish revolution, it is said, merely in order to cut off Germany from a promising market in the East, and to check her penetration of Turkey. We are, accordingly, striking at her through Austria. The legend has been embroidered with much ingenuity. Its latest shape is the really farcical suggestion of Professor Vambéry that it was the Balkan Committee which organised the anti-Austrian boycott in Turkey. Not a member of the Balkan Committee was in Constantinople when the boycott of Austrian ships and vessels sprang up spontaneously among the porters and politicians of Stamboul. An instructed foreigner might criticise the Balkan Committee and its kindred organisations in England on the ground that they are recklessly disinterested idealists, and that they tend at times, by their extreme independence, to embarrass our diplomacy. But no one who knew anything of their membership and temperament could suspect them of acting as the tools of the Foreign Office, still less of plotting to further the interests of British trade. They represent a purely British tradition of disinterested humanitarianism.

The real basis of the English opposition to Austrian policy has no relation whatever to high politics. We think that the success of the Young Turks may mean much for civilisation, and the manœuvres of Baron von Aerenthal and Prince Ferdinand seemed to threaten this promising development. So far as Bosnia is concerned, we cannot ignore the fact that for a generation Austria has ruled it by military law, and that there is nothing in the shape of liberty and intellectual advancement for the Bosnians to correspond with the good military roads for the troops and the comfortable hotels for the tourists. But such considerations apart, the problem is now to contrive a settlement and to avert a war. The payment of a money indemnity by Austria and Bulgaria seems to us at once the easiest and the most equitable solution. Concessions which would give to Servia and Montenegro better communications and a free outlet on the Adriatic would also be necessary to complete such a settlement. It is tempting to ask for autonomy for Bosnia and Herzegovina. But to this we see two objections. In the first place, the unlucky history of Croatia goes to prove that a theoretical autonomy may, in practice, be easily over-ridden, and produce much friction and little real liberty. In the second place, if Europe will only have the good sense to leave Bosnia alone, its annexation may soon lead to the creation of a new Servia or Illyria within the Austro-Hungarian system. Our duty to Europe will not be completed by serving Turkey and vindicating the ideal of public law. To promote a durable peace should be our paramount endeavor.

SAVING AND CHARACTER.

Although, like every lover of the English tongue, Lord Rosebery, in his address on thrift at Edinburgh, showed some sense of the degradation that fine and serviceable word has suffered by subjection to the narrow business spirit of the age, we do not think that he succeeded in restoring its right meaning. Where John Ruskin failed it was hardly to be expected that Lord Rosebery should succeed. Yet the opportunity was a great one, for it is, perhaps, true that the whole social question is contained in a realisation of individual and national "thrift," and in a just comprehension of the relation which "saving" has to it. It is not difficult for a student of modern industry to understand how "saving" has come to swallow up the other elements of thrift. For though an individual or a nation "thrives" more by wise spending than by saving, a conspiracy of modern forces has brought into strong relief the use of accumulation as the instrument of material prosperity. Until comparatively recent times the arts of industry, even among civilised peoples, left no great margin of surplus wealth beyond the provision of the necessaries and prime conveniences of life, and little scope for the profitable employment of capital. The industrial revolution was a trumpet-call for capital, and, as Lord Rosebery recognised, the Scot was among the first to respond to the call. With multitudinous zeal throughout the British dominions he has set himself to save, and to collect and administer the savings of others. The latter is by far the more profitable function. For though the beginning of the fortunes of our modern millionaires may be traced to a nucleus of personal thrift, it takes what Lord Rosebery rather euphemistically styled "a genius for speculation" to amass these enormous properties. To this process goes the painful and involuntary thrift of countless thousands of workers and of small investors, whose efforts seldom fructify to their own advantage.

For when this "genius for speculation" is closely analysed, what does it signify? Take the case cited by Lord Rosebery himself, that of Mr. Andrew Carnegie, or of "a lad who landed in South Carolina 63 years ago with 12s. in his pocket, and died leaving ten millions sterling yesterday." It is not the personal self-sacrifice of millionaires that works these modern marvels, as Mr. Carnegie, in his singularly frank discussion of the origins of wealth, admits. It lies largely in the great capitalist's power to buy cheap the capital and labor of others, and to sell the product as dear as it can be profitably made, by "cornering" natural sources of supply, repressing competition, securing preferences on railroads, extracting tariffs from governments, and utilising every weapon of economic force which comes within his reach. To suggest to the simple working man who puts some savings in the Edinburgh Savings Bank that he is fairly on his way to become a Rockefeller, is to ignore all the most salient features in our modern economy.

For the rest, we are by no means blind to the fine qualities of personal character which have made the Scottish a ruling race. Nor do we grudge the note of triumph in the rhymed caricature of the Scottish invaders of the 18th century:

> "The savage's breeks are on his shoulders,
> So plainly seen by all beholders,
> Half starved, half naked, but one shoe;
> Yet by and by he'll ride o'er you."

But after all there is some limit to the commendation of qualities which enable a man to get the better of his neighbor and to trade upon his weaknesses. If the English and the Irish had been less improvident, more industrious, and keener witted in business, would the Scot have ridden over them so successfully? In one passage, indeed, Lord Rosebery rightly designates thrift as the antithesis of waste. Had he pointed his sermon more directly from this text it would have made more for edification. For he might then have shown individual saving in its proper place. Instead of lending his authority to the entirely false suggestion that saving for old age or other distant purposes is always profitable even for the poorest, he might have urged the right application of thrift in wise expenditure. It is idle for men, drawing their thousands a year from rents and interest upon the savings of others, to urge laborers whose wage is insufficient to provide the elements of healthy subsistence for their families, to put aside money for distant contingencies. For the ordinary laborer with a family to keep cannot afford to save, and such little savings as he does effect are taken out of their very lives.

This unpalatable truth is not to be shirked by allusions to the workman's expenditure on drink. Most, or, to some of us, the whole, of this expenditure is waste. But a true economy would absorb the whole of it and more in furnishing the current requirements for an efficient life. No one who faithfully considers the way in which the poorer workers live, and must live with wages and rents as they stand now, dare tell the ordinary unskilled worker that he ought to save or to postpone the current expenditure of any of his income. But what about his "character," the splendid stimulus such effort of saving will apply? Well, our answer is that just now he cannot afford this character. It is a plain truth that the ordinary agricultural worker in the South of England, in Wales or Ireland, the unskilled laborer in the towns, and the vast majority of women workers, skilled or unskilled, cannot afford to save for any distant object whatever, if they understand what "thrift" really means. Saving should be confined to those who can afford to save: it emerges as an individual duty in its several shapes as the family income reaches and passes certain levels. It is one of the worst burdens of poverty that it forbids any considerable practice of providence. The workman born with a gift for providence may possibly succeed in translating it into adequate provision; but in most cases he is driven to despair.

It is in fact the slow trickling of these truths into the general mind that is at work in all civilised states, converting insurance for various important contingencies, such as illness, accident, unemployment, old age, from private into public provisions. This does not mean that the ordinary workman will no longer practice thrift, but that his thrift will be confined to nearer objects of expenditure, the improvement of his home, more leisure, education, and recreation, and other elements of a higher standard of life. The "saving" will still be done, and done by the people. But it will be more largely a collective than an individual effort. This for two reasons. Saving for sickness, old age, unemployment, &c., involves less effort and expense when done by the wholesale method of taxation than by a retail collection of small weekly sums from door to door—the collective effort is apportioned according to ability to save.

Again, individual working-class saving is a wasteful way of doing it; it is costly, troublesome, and insecure. It is not merely that now and again a slate club fails by the fraud of some official; the whole annals of working-class saving are riddled with stories of wasteful and largely futile effort. The structure of successful joint stock capitalism is very ill-adapted to the needs or the intelligence of tiny working-class investors. Even where it is directed to some early and tangible results, such as the possession or occupation of a house, it is hazardous. But where it involves long, continuous contribution to some far-off or speculative end, it is either a financial instrument for fleecing the workers, or else a clumsy way of doing insecurely what organised society can do better and more securely. It is as important to the character of a nation that it shall collectively practise "thrift" as to that of an individual. The Old Age Pensions scheme which came into operation yesterday is a new and profitable recognition of this public duty. Every growth of such public thrift must tend to banish some baser or more wasteful use of the public resources. It is part of the eternal warfare between productive and unproductive expenditure, between constructive and destructive finance.

Life and Letters.

"SECURITY" AND CHANGE.

The challenge of the present to the future—the insistence of hard, tangible things in a region of dreams and speculations—is a challenge too often forgotten by those who are impatient of the slow processes of change. They see visible evil to be overcome, visions of clearer horizons and a fairer dawn. They cannot understand why mankind round them—equally intelligent, equally compassionate—do not also find their feet marching to the tune of a militant melody. They fail to apprehend rightly the crushing effect of the present, especially as embodied in hard, material realities, upon the minds of the majority of mankind. To these, history is but a misty panorama of uncertain meaning, geography a story of things wonderful and strange, but remote and negligible. Here is the real world: the houses of commerce, four-square, of solid stone, ample Government offices, law courts, police stations, secure private dwellings. "Let him change it who can," their innermost souls declare, in a declaration which actually signifies, "It never will be changed at all." By the many, of all classes, the affirmation of the Psalmist would be readily re-echoed, that "He has held the round world so fast, that it cannot be moved at any time." Inhabitants of the earthquake zones, as has been mournfully demonstrated in this week's cosmic catastrophe, are always convinced that each successive earth tremor will be the last earth tremor, that now, at length, the old earth, after a final shaking, has settled down to sleep. And the same is true of the shaking of the children of earth—the call which has sounded over the nations in succeeding centuries, which has shattered custom, convention, and security, and all the accepted ways. Each revolution is always the last revolution, the final effort of a violence which has expired in this ultimate convulsion.

It is not only that the inhabitants of London cannot picture what London was when the Abbey of Westminster stood up white from green gardens, and over the river the roads ran on causeways through sullen marshes lit by will-of-the-wisps and fever fires. It is that they are unable even to imagine a time when Cadogan Square was a huddle of slum tenements, and Islington an expanse of meadow land, and the places they now occupy long, quiet fields. Lacking such imagination, it is impossible for them to stand up and face the domination of the present with the naked vision of the future. Mr. Wells, at the end of his voyage into Utopia, has described the traveller returning, standing, after so adventurous a journey, at the familiar spot where the Strand debouches into Trafalgar Square. Here everything is the same—the railway stations, the tall buildings with winking sky signs, the column and the lions of the Square, the long, low, brooding ugliness of the National Gallery. Amongst them moves the busy people, hurrying, to-day as yesterday, to and from their sedentary occupations and their comfortable surburban homes. It all appears "so fast" that "it cannot be moved at any time." Utopia, before this intrusive reality—to be seen, touched, handled—rises from the earth and joins the other cloud cities "built in Heaven." An ironical touch may be given by the sight of a squalid, tiny crowd gathered round one of these pillars, with banners demanding the speedy coming of "the Social Revolution," mocked at alike by the solid architecture, the indulgent policemen, the indifferent multitudes who pass by. Mr. Lowes Dickinson, in a dialogue recently published, has confronted a banker, of enlightened views, with the protest of an idealist and reformer against present social injustices. The reformer—from a University common room—has much the best of the argument. Looking out, from those pleasant paths and gardens, not only over the monstrous inequalities of present fortune, but also over all time and all existence, he can reveal to the man of business the impossibility of the present, the urgent necessity for change. The banker has but one argument, but with that he can overwhelm his antagonist, the existence of the present, in solid, appreciable reality. He can hurl at the reformer not acute and ready phrases, but steamships and factories, Lombard Street, Pimlico, Manchester, against which the random Socialist, academic or anarchical, can make no more impression than a rat attempting to gnaw through the granite stones of the Bank of England. Here is partly the insistence of things against ideas, the dominance of the material, "the things," which, according to Emerson, are "in the saddle and ride mankind." Samuel Butler once pictured the revolt of the machine against its master, a kind of universal Frankenstein monster come to life and striking blindly in the dark, like the furious rebellion of some slave race which in the past has occasionally wiped out a civilisation in hideous ruin. But apart from the possibility of such revolt, no first visitor to the newer industrial centres but is aware of a certain shrivelling up of man's importance before the aggregation and elaboration of material construction. The sense of proportion is dwarfed by the mere contrast in size and stability, the puny, weak, unprotected human body contrasted with the vast levers and furnaces which at any moment could crack him like an eggshell, or shrivel him up like sawdust. Human life and mechanical life comes to be pictured in permanence like those gaunt and sullen streets of East London, where tiny cottages crouch beneath tall encompassing walls so high that between them men scarcely can see the sun. But behind the weight laid upon the imagination by mass and matter is the, perhaps, rather more oppressive weight of custom and convention. "Every body"—so commences Newton's famous law—"continues in its state of rest or motion in a straight line." More than of any projectiles careering through limitless space is this true of the mind of man—continuing always, unless forcibly and sometimes brutally wrested away by impacting forces, in its motion in a straight line. Bagehot tells a story of the "very conservative" people of Fiji. "A chief was one day going over a mountain-path, followed by a long string of his people, when he happened to stumble and fall; all the rest of the people immediately did the same except one man, who was set upon by the rest to know whether he considered himself better than the chief." Fiji is too remote a dwelling place for such a leader. He resides to-day in Dulwich, in Poplar, in Eaton Square.

Not only is the Present in its resistance to the future secure in its own armies and entrenchments. It is continually trafficking—and successfully—with the forces of the invader, purchasing them in single spies and in battalions. Every reform, successfully effected, transfers whole divisions and army corps from the attacking to the defending army. The giving of old age pensions, for example, at one stroke swings half a million aged persons passionately on the side of the status quo, passionately against any upheaval which would jeopardise, or might be thought to jeopardise, the regular reckonable dole of two half-crowns per week. And as individuals, nine out of ten at least of the men who would be competent to lead the movement towards change are to-day immediately caught up in the huge machine and provided outlet for their ambitions within a tangible and realisable Present. How many potential Labor leaders and Socialists are at present in London, through the operation of the huge sieve-net of the new scholarship system, pathetically ordered by Mr. Webb, a Socialist, being swept into secondary schools, from working-class homes, and thence, as clerks in great businesses, through University training, in subsequent Government or private employment, destined to be firmly cemented into the fabric of the present social order? Even the Labor leader, if successful, tends to become Conservative, to despise the material he once organised, the masses of unskilled labor, as scattered dust or crumbling snow.

But the great majority of the nation are being intercepted before the opportunity of becoming "Labor leaders" will arise. Their energies are being deflected from politics into individual commercial or industrial enterprise. Socialism seems destined to be left to the idealist and the economic failure, to the man with ready tongue and little stable capacity for work, like the "Masterman" so cruelly portrayed in Mr. Wells's "Kipps," to the reformer who revolts from the harsh operation of present law, but finds no allies but a proletariat from which the intelligence has been steadily drained in early boyhood. It will pass from the antithesis of the class war—the rich against the poor—to the antithesis which Nietszche foresaw many years ago—the Many against the Few, the demands of incapacity to share in the benefits created by the competent. It is under such circumstances that the very buildings and sombre architecture of the present seem to smile down derisive indulgence at the vaporings and pleadings of those who still hope to change the world a little. The infant, says Mr. Whiteing in "The Yellow Van," was blowing lustily upon a tin whistle as the van of the land reformers passed under the walls of Allonby Castle. "Nothing happened to the walls."

Yet against this tyranny of the Present the reformer, after all, has sufficient stores of satisfaction. "He laughs best who laughs the last": and the longest laugh is always on the side of the forces of change. The hills are nothing and flow from form to form: the mountains smoke at the touch of His hand: "He washeth away the things which grow out of the dust of the earth and destroyest the hope of man." Researches in the great canyon of Arizona have revealed not only an eating through miles of solid rock by the flow of a quiet stream of water in a gulf created through almost limitless time, but behind this, in incalculable space of years, a succession of previous operations, formation and upheaval of continents and their overthrow, swinging back the plummets of the mind into abysses beyond the powers of that mind ever to comprehend. The sun and rain and delicate air are wasting away, not only the backbone of the mountains, but also the granite stones of the Bank of England. The Future has great allies. For all the momentary insistence of the material in factory and furnace, the mind can find tranquillity in realisation that this is merely the Idea, clothing itself for a season, and in a temporary habitation: the Idea which can make the rocks dance to its music and the solid ground tremble at its advent. "Cities and Thrones and Powers," to the poet, "stand in Time's eye, almost as long as flowers that daily die." And as of Nineveh there remains but a heap, and of Tyrus a spit of sandy shore, and of Sagesta but one solemn temple looking down the valley to the sea, so the imagination of the seer can triumphantly fling off the yoke of the Present to see in solid England dynamic instead of static forces, and all the cities in motion and flow towards some unknown ends. This may not provide any peculiar satisfaction for present endeavor, There is no guarantee, because change is inevitable, that change will come along desirable ways. Nor does any consolation reside in the knowledge that one day, without a shadow of uncertainty, great London itself will become but a vast tomb for all its busy peoples, and of its splendor and pride not one stone be left upon another. But it does release from the tyranny of a Present which sees no change possible. If change must come, then it may well be deflected along desirable ways. The direction of forces is so much easier than the initiation of them. "Yet it moves" is the eternal affirmation, as much over societies which appear stationary as over societies which appear reckless in progress, over each successive solid Present, crowning itself with flowers and holding itself immortal. For over each, with its ample Government offices, its law courts, its police stations, its secure private dwellings, there has been written an epitaph, the inexorable law of a Universe, not of Being, but of Becoming—a law frightfully illustrated in the terrific catastrophe which has just passed over Calabria and Sicily—"A wind passeth over it: it is gone: the place thereof shall know it no more."

THE GLEAM

It may have been in reality or only in a picture that we once saw a vision of Hell receiving its New Year consignment of paving stones. Thousands of black demons were unloading and laying them down with much ado, and we noticed that on a large number of the slabs were inscribed the words of Merlin to the Young Mariner:—

> "After it, follow it, > Follow the Gleam!"

So it is evident that the Gleam is very prominent in men's minds at this season, and that, in hewing out their good intentions for the coming year, they, like true pavement artists, illuminate them with the familiar motto.

Certainly, it is impossible to choose a finer text for decorative purposes. We all admire the man who sees his Gleam clear ahead of him and follows it over wilderness and woodland, among the rolling of dragons and the cataract music of falling torrents, past silent rivers and through enchanted cities, onward into the valley of the shadow, till it hovers all but in Heaven. We admire and envy, for we recognise that this is quite the proper thing to do. Nor does it appear so very difficult. He for whom the Gleam shines as a guide must feel the solid assurance of the hymn beginning "When I can read my title clear to mansions in the skies." Confidence is easy where there is no further reason for doubt, and who would shrink from toil, privation, or danger, when a star leads him forward, with promise of glories yet to be revealed? "Whom thou dost not forsake, O Genius," sang Goethe in his youth, "into his heart no rain, no storm can breathe a fear. Whom thou dost not forsake, O Genius, confronting clouds of deluge and tempests of hail he will sing as the lark high up in heaven."

It is all very enviable. We know there are men who have followed their star through poverty and danger and bitter persecution. We do not count among them Tennyson, who told of the Gleam, nor Goethe, who sang of genius, for they were favored by fortune from birth. But we remember Cervantes in his prison, Bunyan in his prison, Milton smitten by every curse of fate, Blake in his poverty, and even Burns, though people have said he sold his Gleam for a competency of gauging beer and tallow. We recognise such men as of fine nobility, and happy besides, no matter what disasters buffeted them. But there are not very many whose justification has been so conspicuous, and if we descend to a plane just below the highest, we may find ourselves faced with shrewd questions about that Gleam.

Take, for instance, the case of John Clare, once called the Peasant Poet by the half-dozen people in London who met him. If ever man followed his Gleam, John Clare did. Born a premature, wizened, and illegitimate imp in fenny gloom near Peterborough, he tended geese and sheep, he gardened for a lord, he ploughed badly, he wandered with gypsies, and lay out drunk of nights, he lived equally in love and in debt, he starved in dirt, he produced seven children, he went mad, and spent the last twenty years of his life alone in Northampton madhouse. Yet two doctors signed his lunacy certificate on the ground of his having passed his years "addicted to poetical prosings," and in the asylum he produced his best work. Undoubtedly, through every fortune he followed the Gleam, and, perhaps, we may count him happy, for he was a better poet than peasant. He wrote a few verses of strange and personal beauty—innocency touched with a fond and lingering observation—as in the madhouse lyric, called "The Dying Child," which contains the characteristic lines:—

> "His eyes glanced at the white-nosed bee;
> He knew those children of the Spring;
> When he was well and on the lea
> He held one in his hands to sing,
> Which filled his heart with glee."

We may count him happy in his following of the Gleam, and Mr. Arthur Symons has just collected some of his best work (Clarendon Press). But in the introduction, the latest piece of Mr. Symons's beautiful criticism, we read:—

> "Clare's poetry begins by having something clogging in it; substance, and poetical substance, is there, but the poetry has hardly worked its way out to freedom. That it should have got so far on the way there is one of the most astonishing things in literature."

Shall one follow the Gleam from fen to madhouse only to be an astonishment in the end, like a dog's dancing—

"not well done, but the wonder is it should be done at all"?

Or there is Clare's contemporary, Ebenezer Elliott, the Corn Law Rhymer, of whom Carlyle wrote in his zeal for labor:—

> "It used to be said that lions do not paint, that poor men do not write; but the case is altering now. Here is a voice coming from the deep Cyclopian forges, where Labor, in real soot and sweat, beats with his thousand hammers the red son of the furnace. . . . There are unhappy times in the world's history, when he that is the least educated will chiefly have to say that he is the least perverted."

It may be so. Certainly, the Corn Law Rhymer followed the Gleam among the furnaces of Sheffield, and perhaps we may count him happy, for a few of his sayings ring like beaten brass. Yet, in the last fifty years how many have looked at his works? His vogue has long been limited, we believe, to the Cobden Club.

Take Joseph Skipsey, another contemporary—take the miner poet whose record by Dr. Spence Watson we noticed two or three weeks ago. In the coal pits he, too, followed the Gleam and found a reward not to be despised. Yet how nearly the verdict of Burne-Jones on him agrees with the verdict of Mr. Arthur Symons on Clare, or of Dr. Johnson on the dancing dog:—

> "Burne-Jones said the circumstances of Skipsey's life had left him at a disadvantage in the art of writing poetry for which nothing could make up. He thought Skipsey must carry about with him the pain of knowing that all he did could only be judged after allowances made."

The boy went to the pit at seven years old, and taught himself to read by the light of a miner's gleam. Did all that heroic purpose end in carrying about with him the pain of that depressing knowledge?

Yet another of their contemporaries died some days ago in Leicester at a good old age. Her name was Ruth Wills, poetess, and she also began to work at seven, on eighteenpence a week. She learnt to read in a Sunday school, worked at hosiery in the same mill for sixty years, and was a regular contributor to the "Leicester Chronicle." We read that "she published two small volumes, called 'Lays of Lowly Life,' which had a circulation in the Midlands and are now forgotten. As a strong Nonconformist she also enjoyed the friendship of the late Dr. Legge and Mr. Allanson Picton, late M.P. for Leicester." To this end she followed the Gleam.

"Res angusta domi"—"Slow rises worth by poverty depressed"—the texts are worn very thin. But the real tragedy is, not that worth rises slowly, but that it is not so worthy to rise. We grant that the low-born poets we have mentioned had a reward. They won an edition by Mr. Arthur Symons, an essay by Carlyle, a biography by Dr. Spence Watson, or the friendship of the late Dr. Legge. Two of them, at least, had a real touch of poetry and a power of showing it besides. But just because they were bred in poverty, they remained as dancing dogs in the ranks of literature, and the first thought in reading them is the wonder that it should be done at all.

And what shall we say of the thousands who do not get so far even as a dancing dog? In that same essay on the Corn Law Rhymer, Carlyle has the comfortable sentence: "Where a genius has been given, a possibility, a certainty of its growing is also given." The thought is characteristic of his unshaken belief in the triumph of good. But it is profoundly untrue. The genius that wins distinction in the modern world is almost invariably sprung from the well-educated classes. They have the monopoly of opportunity, but we need not suppose they have a monopoly of genius. Over the heads of the million children now sitting in our Board Schools is there no beckoning Gleam? The present writer has known boys among them who were born to be generals, explorers, mighty engineers, artists, and humorists. But what could Merlin say to them? Could he say: "After it, follow it, follow the Gleam!" when their mothers were waiting for their six shillings a week? Could he honestly say it when he knew that their very accent alone cut them off for ever from any chance of becoming generals, explorers, or any of the other distinguished persons which the Gleam lured them to become? In all the wastefulness of nature there is no such pitiful waste, but it is thus she lavishes away her riches by the hundred thousand a year, and to talk here of following the Gleam is but a mockery.

Others there are beside who suffer more subtle frustration: spirits so fastidious as to hide themselves in commonplace lest they should degrade their high and secret calling; spirits of so tender a sympathy that the claim of pity or family or public service drags them irresistibly aside. One of the finest imaginative writers is now inditing Civil Service reports for fear of writing badly. One of the finest essayists devotes his passing years to a hopeless cause because he cannot endure the pity of it. Byron's Gleam was plain enough, but he won his highest honor by turning from it to fling away his life. Mr. A. E. Housman teaches Latin, Mr. Birrell is in the Cabinet. After all, it is not so easy as it seems to follow that Gleam whose motto annually illuminates the pavement of Hell.

THE BROKEN ALABASTER.

The story of the woman with the alabaster box is recorded in all the Gospels, but with remarkable variations. The fourfold record, and the large margin of fluctuation, point to one thing—the episode had made a deep impress on the minds of the Christian community. It was repeated over and over again, till, like stories often told, it gathered variants, and the precise form of the original version is lost.

If we take St. Mark's dating of the episode, and borrow one or two points from the other synoptists, we get a singularly vivid story. It is near the end of the life of Jesus, at the time when the tension that preceded his betrayal was at its highest. He had "set his face" for Jerusalem, with a keen sense that all the forces working against him would be focussed there. His disciples in some measure shared his mood, but with mingled feelings. They foresaw some strong risk of disaster; Judas perhaps prophesied it in his shrewd way; and no one of them was easy. Their Master's life was at stake; their friendship with this strange, original man, and all that it meant, seemed only too likely to be ended; and, if He were gone, what became of all He had taught them about the Heavenly Father and His Kingdom? Was it still possible to avert ruin for all their hopes, and, above all, to save the man they loved from destruction? At this juncture, a Pharisee asked them to his house.

It would be interesting to know the mind of this man. His courtesy, according to some of the accounts, had limits soon reached, and his critical attitude toward his guest was easily read. What did he mean? Was it candor that impelled him to the questionable step of association with a marked man—or curiosity—or was he a foe in disguise? Whatever the host was, the guest, who spoke as never man spoke, whose words of charm had won so many, might perhaps influence him, with or against his will. Some slight ray of hope flickered here. It was speedily extinguished. A woman appeared and threw herself at the feet of Jesus. Every one saw what she was—"except the Prophet," the host murmured to himself. She finally disposed of any chance that the Pharisee would take up the cause of his guest, if there had been any at the beginnning. It was the very moment when one of the deplorable people, who always appealed to Jesus, could best have been spared. Yet Jesus was the one person unembarrassed.

How the meal went on we can barely imagine. Suddenly, if we can trust a participle of St. Mark's, there was a sharp crack, and the room was filled with the fragrance of a rich unguent. The woman had broken an alabaster box of spikenard, worth, as someone instantly computed, three hundred pence—a year's wages for an honest workman. Let us, however, look at St Mark's word, an aorist participle. The Greek verb itself means "to smash"—the box was broken in such a way that it was box no more, nothing but broken pieces. The aorist, as the grammarians put it, implies a momentary action. It looks as if the breaking was a sudden resolve. How did it come about?

This, perhaps, is the explanation. She came, drawn to the one man for whom she was not unclean, whose eyes, as they rested on her, saw her better self, and brought it again into being, till she could think of herself as God's child, loved, lost, and found again. She brought the ointment, which hints clearly enough at the extravagance of her life, for it was luxury of a prodigal kind. Perhaps she meant to pour some of it upon Jesus. Even a little would have been an entertainment for a prince. And then—perhaps the lid, or the cover, or whatever it was, stuck and could not be moved. So that it came to this: she must take it away as she brought it, and Jesus would have none of it, or—there was one alternative. A sandal loosened, a sharp crack, and he had it all. It was All or Nothing.

The effect on the company is in our records—money calculations and annoyance. What Jesus felt is to be divined from His words. Death looked Him in the face, hourly drawing nearer; and here was a devotion, a love, and a surrender, of the most astounding whole-heartedness, exactly at the moment when failure and betrayal were most evident. Here was a spirit after His own heart—All or Nothing.

For, if we consider His position, it was determined by the same thought—All or Nothing. From the first He had been the idealist. Satan might offer the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them for the price of a little tact; a price which Jesus interpreted as a change of God. The saddest thing in the history of the world's progress is the record of idealists who have compromised, and here was one who would not. If He was right in His view of God, if He really knew His Heavenly Father, there was nothing to be done but to do His will and accept it. If God wished to see Him carry His message through, God would see to it; but He would accept no other aid. It was God's affair. He did not half-believe, as so many men do, using the arts learnt of old from the enemy to promote the new cause of God. He believed quite—all or nothing. All for God and all from God—or nothing. It was the supreme venture of faith, with issues for mankind of the most awful, and Jesus was prepared to lose all, to see everything for which He stood, wrecked, ruined, and abolished, sooner than waive the least point. "Thy will be done," He said, and He knew to whom He said it. And here was a woman who would do the same for Him. The disciples had left all to follow Him, but she was more definitely disinterested, for she had no hope of a throne in the Kingdom. She was, perhaps, the first to achieve the Master's spirit in this direction.

This "breaking the box" has been the crux in all movements of progress and reformation, political or religious. From Paul, who shipwrecked a career, and gave up learning, wealth, dignity, family, friends and fellow-students—"I have suffered the loss of all things"—to the men of Marseilles, who marched to Paris "prepared to die," and gave France her national hymn, and, in some measure, her national existence, all the movements have depended on the "all-or-nothing" people. "They," said Mr. By-Ends, pointing along the road to Christian and Hopeful, "are for hazarding all for God at a clap . . . but I am for Religion in what, and so far as the times and my safety will bear it." The question is really a very old one. What is that you praise? asked Plato; is it the thing or the thing plus? the rewards of righteousness along with it, or "the actual naked thing in itself, righteousness"? That is where and why men split, for unless the latter is their choice, they dare not hazard all at a clap.

But, of course, to hazard all at a clap may undo everything. How little after all Jesus actually did! Think of His gifts of insight and expression, His grasp of reality, His passion for God, and His power of capturing men—all snuffed out, before more than a dozen or two, and those quite common people, had a chance of knowing what He was! What a mistake! But Prudence cannot quite say that. Yet will Prudence here and now admit that a man, who "does things quite," will achieve more by being snuffed out than the most glorious and successful "half-and-half" manages in the longest life of ingenious contrivance? Not readily, and yet God's preference seems fairly clear. The real difficulty is in unstrapping the sandal for the one crack that will break the box past mending.

THE SLEEPERS.

In the attic, where a half-finished piece of cabinet-making has awaited us several months, there is something hanging on the wall that looks like a faded black glove. It is a bat, called by our people here "leather'ing bat." It is still and cold—not merely negatively cold, but positively so, and when we have with difficulty unhooked it from its ledge it lies on the hand like lead. Only a fortnight ago it was flittering round the house and the cypress trees after rare insects. In less than a month, an isolated mild day may bring it forth again on a still more hopeless quest, for the majority of insects are past waking now, except in the immortal sequence of their eggs. They who moved a load of bricks last week found in the internal dry chinks a queen wasp in her motionless, brittle-limbed sleep from which she would have almost infallibly wakened about the time of gooseberry blossoms. But they found also many flies, spiders, earwigs, moths, beetles, undoubtedly dead and most of them representing species of which not one individual now remains alive. Perhaps there is more that calls for wonder in the egg that can be cased in ice, sodden with winter slush, parched, frozen, broiled, and yet retain its spark of vitality and keep appointment with its caterpillar for a given week in May, than in the furred animal that sleeps like the dead in a dry attic. It is hibernation, though, that most readily wins our admiration—the care of an apparently sapient individual for its own skin, the mechanism of a grown and intricate organism that allows an apparently total abeyance of the vital functions and an ensuing resurrection.

In our temperate climate hibernation is very slightly and fitfully practised. When the globe has swung down, down in its northern trend till it stops for a day or two at the lowest point as though every year there was some doubt whether it would ever face the sun again, many things are asleep—badger, squirrel, dormouse, vole, shrew, and in a real cold winter several other considerable animals. But there is probably not one calendar month in which any one of them has not been seen abroad. The mildness of our winter is often their bane. It would be better for them to sleep soundly till the whole world was ready to waken at once; honeyed flowers for the bees; insects and herbage as food for hedgehog and vole; frogs, mice and eggs in the nest for those of grosser appetites. The fat accumulated at the autumn feast would serve a sleeping animal as well for four months as for two, while it is very trying and often fatal to awaken in the middle of a foodless night under the impression that warmth and plenty have come again. The tragedy presents itself every year in the shape of slow-worms cut off by sudden frost from the return to their hibernaculum, of dormouse or squirrel dead beside the emptied store that should not have been attacked till March, of thousands of caterpillars that have bored up through the snow which falling on a warm earth has given them the sensation of spring sunshine. The winter butterfly is a more marked phenomenon, the small tortoiseshell coming forth on any fine day after January has opened, but whether to perish or to go to bed again and appear again later we cannot say. Probably it is only the best sleepers that make that braver spring show when the nettles are up for the grubs to feed upon, and there will be no more relapse into frost and snow. The peacock and the red admiral, on the other hand, are more thorough hibernators, the latter waking so late that there are not a few naturalists who declare that it does not hibernate at all but is blown here from earlier countries in May after the first spring brood.

And what is happening in the hive whence comes the soul of the garden as soon as the golden crocus chalices are full of pollen? Scarcely a week ago, there passed in and out the narrowed door a few of the workers flying in a forlorn world for exercise or from sheer restlessness. There were even one or two that made a half-hearted attempt to respond to the untimely invitation of the wallflowers. But now the hive is like a city of the dead by comparison with the summer throng that we saw with Shakespeare's eyes:—

> "Stake boot upon the summer's velvet buds.
> Which pillage they with merry march bring home
> To the tent-royal of their emperor."

He who has the somewhat cruel curiosity to take off the roof and lift the quilts shall see a silent throng of bees hooked together and hanging between the warmest central combs. The queen, her season of egg-laying over, is no more regarded than the humblest worker (if there were among these Socialists degrees of humbleness). Those who have their feet on the honey-cells hand down the social sweet to others who pass it on and on, till every unit is fed and thus able to contribute to the warmth on which the whole mass depends. They are all unemployed. No work can by any means be found for them. So they live on the capital they produced in happier times. The sun still shines for them from the thousand hexagonal cells in which they had the prudence to store it while they might. Very soon now, the empty cells in the middle of their cluster-comb will inspire the queen with the idea of laying a score or so of eggs, and the old bees that disdain such work in summer will feed the young nurses of the next generation but one. A cold snap may give them a Malthus scare and provoke the hasty destruction of the brood; but the first excuse for renewed optimism will be seized, and again tiny grubs will come in the drowsy hive. The willow catkins of March will not lack their musical myriads.

Yet the solstice is not mid-winter. Our almanacks, founded on the irrefutable testimony of the thermometer and we know not what other instruments, declare that on Christmas Day winter begins. The big frosts of the year, the snow and the biting winds come in January, February, March, and even April, and rarely, as in this week, in November or December. The townsman shivers at the thought of a country ramble on February 14, Midwinter Day, when nevertheless the skylark is singing, the partridge is paired, the celandine, dog's mercury and hazel are in bloom. There is a difference of forty-five days between the calendar mid-winter and the solstice. On glancing through a record of first and last appearances we find that the bee's mid-winter is January 5, the pipistrelle bat's January 30, the swallow's January 7, the chiffchaff's January 3, and the wasp's January 8. Optimists all. The lengthening day is a fact and a hope that outweighs the cold inertia of the earth. Even the earth things feel the turning again towards the sun, for from Christmas Day forth the herbs one after another put out leaves and blossom. The helebore begins to shoot up baby green; the spurge laurel is visibly preparing its pale flowers, to be followed by the bright pink of its near relative, the mezereon; the snowdrops are up and the crocuses have nearly an inch of leaves tied in a sheaf for the protection of the glory that they enfold. Perhaps these precocious blossoms are responsible for the early rising of the bee; perhaps they are due to the bee's industrious gardening. In the end there is no caller-up but the sun, and every spring (or must we say winter?) proves that quite a small whisper suffices for many of the sleepers.

Present-Day Problems.

THE BREAKDOWN OF SCHOOL FEEDING.

It is not merely the delay in placing the cost of school feeding upon the rates that has brought upon the Moderate party in the County Council the disapproval of all London and the contempt of the provinces. The delay has certainly been a mistake, and has hampered their administration; but, irrespective of that, their methods have been chaotic, demoralising and unscientific.

From the beginning it was clear to everyone else that, no matter how often the Mayoral hat went round, the amount thrown in would be insufficient. For years voluntary funds have been raised for feeding school-children, and these, which have been small in better times, could not possibly meet the needs of this winter. Altogether the action of the Sub-Committee on Underfed Children seems to have been strangely short-sighted. On December 7th there was a sum of £1,400 in the Council poor-box, and the Sub-Committee declared that it would need £4,000 by the end of January. A week later, at an emergency meeting, this same Committee gave up all hope of sufficient voluntary contributions and demanded £10,000 from the rates to last till the end of January! No sooner had the Council agreed to this than another abortive appeal was made through the Lord Mayor for further doles. Already about £5,000 has been paid from the rates for equipment, rent, cooking and service at feeding centres, and in salaries for the Council's own organisers, of whom there are fourteen. This sum almost equals the amount subscribed during the year by the charitable millionaires of London. Yet still thousands of hungry children go unfed, meals are irregularly given, much of the food is unsuitable, and is served under insanitary and uncivilised conditions.

It cannot for a moment be imagined that the 38,000 children now declared to be necessitous include all the underfed children in the schools. At the beginning of December there were already 39,000 men registered under the Distress Committees of London. Is it rash to estimate that at least 50,000 of their children are in the schools? Then there are some 8,000 girls and boys of school age (nearly all the children of widows) whose parents are in receipt of outdoor relief. In a better year than this it has been estimated that more than half of these must be underfed simply from lack of income. Finally, there are the thousands of children dependent on casual laborers, unemployed workmen not registered, struggling homeworkers, sick or disabled or vicious parents, all unable to provide sufficient maintenance. At its very lowest, the number of necessitous children can be little less than 80,000.

Yet the last return presented to the Council gave the total number reported as necessitous at 38,381, and of these nearly 600 were not being fed. Every week there has been this discrepancy, happily growing less, so that the figures of the unfed since the beginning of November run as follows:—

For the week ending	November	6th	...	1,274
,, ,,	,,	13th	...	2,723
,, ,,	,,	20th	...	1,262
,, ,,	,,	27th	...	1,026
,, ,,	December	4th	...	826
,, ,,	,,	11th	...	588

There can be no excuse for this delay in preparing for a continuously increasing number, which must have been foreseen. Any Sunday-school superintendent used to holding a yearly treat would have coped with the problem more speedily.

But, in any event, the number of those who actually are fed is still small. Out of the 917 public elementary schools in London only 553 are reporting necessitous children. There are thus 364 schools which are not feeding any of their scholars. Some of them are in poor neighborhoods, and it may almost certainly be said that not one is really without any necessitous families. In such cases it often happens that the parents of children who are in need of food do not ask for it. They say simply, "Oh, there aren't any meals being given at that school"—not knowing that if they asked it must be given. Nor is any effort made to enlighten them. In all the schools the decision as to whether or no children are necessitous is left to the Care Committees, voluntary bodies appointed by the school managers, and increased by co-option. But no rule has been laid down by which they are to judge "necessity." The Act directs that it shall be based on the physical condition of the child. In practice it is based on that or any other consideration which may appeal to a particular Committee, varying not only from school to school, but even in the same school from day to day. At School A. a boy may get a dinner if his teacher thinks he needs it; at School B. he may not get one because he played truant last week. Even in the same school children of the same family may not both get meals, because, for example, one is in the infants' department, where the mistress "believes in" school feeding, and one in the boys' department, where the master is against it. In one case, little Polly Smith, a mite of five years old, got no dinner, but Johnny, two years older, and in the boys' department, had 4·2 dinners a week (for that is the Moderate average). He was given a ticket for an eating-house, and he pleaded with the waiter-gentleman to let Polly in and give her half his pennyworth of bread and pudding. So the two shared their chair, their plate, and doubtless their spoon.

Of the enormous irregularities in administration between schools there is ample proof. To take a few examples only: In one very poor district it is found that of three schools one feeds 33 per cent., the next 20 per cent., the third less than 3 per cent. In another case, a school which had no Care Committee last year then fed 280, and this year, in a time of far greater distress, feeds only 90. There are two methods by which numbers may be reduced in this fashion, and both are freely used throughout London. One is to discourage applications, the other to deny the necessity of the children after investigation.

The first is often very successfully carried out by charitable busybodies, who go the rounds in a poor district persuading mothers that the meals are meant for the unemployed only, or that it is a disgrace to have their children fed by what they are pleased to call charity. The Council, however, has found a still better method. They have compelled the Care Committees, under threat of doing it themselves, to issue to all parents applying for meals a stern circular demanding payment therefor and threatening legal proceedings to recover it if the parents turn out not to be necessitous. Though the circular contains this "if," and may be explained away by a kindly visitor, the paragraph from the Act at the bottom of the page seems to leave no way out, and the distracted parent, terrified by the legal phraseology, is sure that payment will be demanded, that it cannot be met, that prison will result, and, therefore, that the children's application must be at once withdrawn. The deterrent effect of Circular 91 is not visionary; it is a fact that parents have, under its influence, refused to apply for the meals their children needed. And yet already the Council contemplate a more ferocious document!

Some Care Committees have gone further along the path of deterrent treatment, and one at least has refused to put any child on the list until its parent has made an application in person to the Committee. The meetings are in the afternoon, so that children with only one parent, and that parent at work, are barred from the school meals. So, also, are those with sick parents, or, in still more pathetic cases, those whose mothers have neither boots nor clothes in which to appear before this little inquisition. For such, indeed, they feel it to be, and so must all who realise the pain of that cross-questioning, the shame of telling to that listening group of well-fed, warmly-dressed men and women all the squalid details of poverty, the pitiful little shifts, the selling and pawning of furniture and clothes. It is an audience, too, which is seeking an excuse to deny the necessity—to refuse to grant help. "The women," it was said of one of these meetings, "often cry." It is hideous to think that we cannot believe that children are hungry—children with thin little bodies, pale, anæmic faces, dull, spiritless eyes—unless their mothers with their tears attest it.

The general method, however, only allows a deterrent "test" at a later stage. The children are, in the first instance, selected by teachers or managers or members of Care Committees; sometimes they or their parents ask for meals. By the former method it is obvious that some children may be overlooked. "I think it was my new boots," said one boy. "He called me up, but he didn't give me a ticket, and he had a good look at my boots." "It's because I send her to school too tidy," said a mother. "If she had a torn pinny and no stockings she'd get dinners fast enough."

And if the teachers, with all their experience of the children in their care, cannot always judge the question of underfeeding—really a matter of medical or at least hygienic training—what are we to say of the hundreds of voluntary investigators now being let loose over London to decide the question? The majority know nothing of the household economics of the working class. Used themselves to a solid breakfast, a lunch of at least a meat and pudding course, a tea at four or five o'clock, and a three or four course dinner after that, they employ for the poor a completely new standard. A few kippers, some potatoes, and bread seem to some of them a good dinner for a family which has only three meals a day. They solace their souls with the thought that the poor are used to little. "You must try and save something now," said one such visitor to a widow with two children and 10s. a week. "If it's only a shilling a week, it's something." The Care Committees are little better. A visitor reported that a family occupied two rooms, but had sold nearly all the furniture. All the bedclothes had gone save one coverlet for the children; yet they were refused meals because when visited they were having a good dinner! Another Committee refused because the parents were not married. Perhaps the crowning injustice to the children, however, is done by those Committees which actually declare that they give no dinners to any children whose parents are in receipt of outdoor relief. It is admitted that they may be necessitous, and that the income may be insufficient, but simply because they do receive relief their children must continue to starve. By what right are these Committees setting aside the Act and creating a new disqualification?

It may be true that hundreds of parents are undeserving but will they be the more deserving because their children are still further punished? The Act was passed that children need no longer lose the value of the education which we had determined must be given them, through their being hungry and unfit. Let us, if we can, save the children's bodies and the parents' souls by feeding the hungry and punishing the neglectful, but do not let us leave the children starving and let the parents go scot-free. And do not let us adopt the cruel deterrent methods of making application painful and uncertain. If we are going to exclude children from the school dinners, we must do so on clear and uniform principles known to everyone, and must take prompt action to enforce them. At present the particular school, or even department of a school, the particular locality, the fact of being north or south of the Thames, constitute more important factors than simply being hungry.

Now that the citizens of London are having to pay the whole cost, are they going to let children still go hungry at the caprice of the parents, the teachers, the Care Committees, or the Moderate majority at Spring Gardens?

THE REIGN OF THE ELECTRON.

Thirty years ago Sir William Crookes showed a series of astonishing experiments on what he called "the fourth state of matter," or "radiant matter." Almost everyone is now familiar with the "Crookes tube," by means of which the Röntgen, or X, rays are produced—a glass globe into opposite ends of which are sealed two platinum wires, one terminating in a small flat plate of platinum, and the other in a slightly cup-shaped plate of aluminium, inside the tube. When these wires have been fixed, the air is almost completely withdrawn from the tube. If then an electric discharge is sent through it from the plate to the cup, there is shot off from the latter towards the opposite end of the tube a stream of something which possesses very extraordinary properties. Crookes showed that this stream was able to move little wheels placed inside the tube, and to produce many other striking results. The nature of this stream was a subject for conjecture: Crookes called it "radiant matter"; others thought that it was a wave motion of the ether, as light is; but it was soon found that by holding a magnet close to the tube the stream was deflected out of its course, so that it could not be light. This "radiant matter," although it makes the glass phosphorescent, cannot come through it; and it gives rise to the well-known Röntgen rays, which, however, are quite different from the stream itself. Lenard, a German experimenter, showed that this "radiant matter" could be brought through the tube into the outside air by removing the portion of the glass wall of the tube, and fixing a very thin "window" of aluminium at the place where the stream struck the glass, this window being, of course, perfectly air-tight. Further, it was shown that this stream of radiant matter consists of a crowd of inconceivably minute particles, each of which carries a charge of negative electricity, and the speed with which it travels inside the tube was calculated to be something like sixty thousand miles per second

These particles are called electrons; and when we say that they have been found to be negatively electrified, we do not mean to imply any such slur on their condition as may be contained in the word negative: we mean that the kind of electrical effect which they produce is the same as that produced by a stick of sealing-wax after it has been rubbed by a piece of flannel, the terms positive and negative, as applied to electricity, being arbitrary. The electrons are sometimes called particles of negative electricity; they are the very smallest bodies of which we have at present any knowledge. We have described them in some detail for the reason that the whole trend of Physics during the last thirty years—accelerated very much during the last ten—is to regard them as the most important things in the Universe. They are (partly, at least) the "stuff" of which the atoms of all bodies are made; and they are always the same, from whatever kind of body they are obtained.

Let us consider for a moment their relation to an atom of a body. An atom of hydrogen is an inconceivably small thing (as are the atoms of all bodies), and within it are contained about one thousand electrons, each of them whirling round in a path or orbit, and completing this path with inconceivably great speed. The space occupied by the atom is, however, almost a vacant space, notwithstanding that there are a thousand electrons contained in it, the size of these electrons being so extremely small. Sir Oliver Lodge gives us a picture of the interior of the hydrogen atom as follows: Imagine the atom to be magnified to the size of an average church, and the electrons and their distances apart to be magnified on the same scale; the electrons would then be each of about the size of a full stop on this page. However incredible all this may be seem, it is absolutely certain that these electrons exist. Indeed, any objection that we may feel disposed to urge must be weakened by the consideration that if we admit the existence of any space, however small, we are compelled to admit that an infinitely smaller one must exist also.

But the hydrogen atom does not consist solely of these thousand electrons. What about the space within the atom which they do not occupy? Is it vacant or filled with something? The answer to this has not yet been satisfactorily found. When we knock off one or more of the electrons from the atom—as can be done in various ways—what remains is found to act as a positively charged electric body. In addition, then, to the negative electrons, there must be something else in the atom possessing the nature of positive electricity; but whether this positive thing is a single nucleus, or several such, or some medium in which the electrons move, we do not yet know.

Science indicates that these amazingly small electrons play many, and most important, parts in nature. An electric current is simply a current, or procession, of electrons. When a body of any kind is heated to incandescence, the speeds with which the electrons revolve in their paths within the atom which contains them far transcend all imagination. Some perform in one second about four hundred billions of revolutions; others seven hundred billions, and others even more. It is to these prodigious revolutions, disturbing the ether of space, that what we call light is due—red light corresponding to the four hundred and violet to the seven hundred billions of oscillations per second. Not merely light, but also magnetism is explained by the whirlings of these electrons within the atoms of bodies; and it is believed that the earth is being perpetually bombarded with streams of them from the sun, resulting probably in such phenomena as the Aurora Borealis.

One great mystery still baffles both mathematicians and physicists—namely, gravitation; but it is probable that it, too, results from some action of electrons on the universal ether. Closely also connected with these particles of negative electricity are the wonderful radiations sent forth so markedly by radium, uranium, and, indeed, to some small extent by all bodies. These radiations, of course invisible to the unaided eye, can be made manifest by allowing them to fall on a photographic plate or some kind of prepared screen which can be rendered phosphorescent by their impact; and they always take place when electrons have been removed from the atoms of the bodies concerned.

All such phenomena are subjects of daily investigation, controlled by exact scientific processes, and subjected to mathematical calculation by several physicists, foremost among whom in England are J. J. Thomson, Townsend, Ramsay, and Rutherford.

In the present state of the subject we are often called upon to make new suppositions in order to explain observed facts; and new facts are being discovered at such a rate that we sometimes feel as if we were being overwhelmed by a mob of hypotheses. But, in spite of this, the transformation that has been effected in modern science by the discovery that the "atoms" of a past generation are far from being either simple or indestructible, is one that will endure; and it is strange that our modern discoveries should in some ways rehabilitate some ancient notions. In view of streams of "radiant matter," Newton's theory that light is due to the emission of corpuscles does not now seem so far removed from fact as it did a few years ago.

It is impossible to do more in the space at our disposal than to call the attention of the reader who is interested in science, without being a specialist, to the ideas which are to-day predominant. Two or three books giving a popular, and, at the same time, accurate, account of modern science have been recently sent to us. A short time ago we dealt with M. Lucien Poincaré's "The New Physics," in which an ample account of the new ideas is given. This work has been succeeded by the same author's "Electricity, Present and Future,"* which differs from the former in dealing with the practical applications of electricity and magnetism to electric traction, lighting, and other commercial uses. With the historical order in which our knowledge of electricity and magnetism has actually been developed, beginning with the lodestone and the rubbing of amber, most educated people are, to some extent, familiar; but in this, as in other subjects, the logician delights in imagining another order in which phenomena might have been presented, with greater simplicity, perhaps, and more striking effect. Thus, M. Poincaré shows how, by merely causing a coil of wire, or a nearly closed loop, to move rapidly in the neighborhood of a magnet, all the phenomena of electric currents and sparks which were a generation ago produced for us by machines which we now regard as fossil, and which lie in our laboratories covered with dust or have become mere toys, can be produced. Indeed, this inversion of the chronological order of knowledge is to a great extent adopted in many text-books, and in the teaching of our schools, so that teachers of the old régime find occasionally some difficulty in falling into line with the newer methods.

Another recent work, by Mr. Charles R. Gibson,† gives a complete account of the new scientific developments. Indeed, we have seen no book of such great value to the general reader, and even the scientific student will find it a most helpful epitome of what is at present known on all the subjects of which it treats.

THE REVIVAL OF FRENCH RADICALISM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The Government of M. Clemenceau has for once justified a proverb. When M. Clemenceau became President of the Council after the general election of 1906 the political prophets gave him a very short tenure of office and, with every new meeting of Parliament, we have been told that the Ministry could not last. But here it is, after two and a half years, about to enter on its third Session.

As I have more than once said in these columns, the Clemenceau Ministry has lasted because there has been no other combination ready to replace it. Once there was such a combination; but it was headed by M. Millerand, and it was easily killed by Mr. Clemenceau's ridicule. The Chamber may not be profoundly attached to M. Clemenceau, but it has no desire to exchange him for M. Millerand and M. Doumer, both of whom (whether justifiably or not) possess to a remarkable degree the faculty of inspiring distrust. The Government has several times been in far greater danger than on the occasion of M. Millerand's famous assault, but it has always been saved by M. Clemenceau's marvellous resource and consummate ability in playing off his adversaries against one another. Each attack has ended in an overwhelming majority for the Government, obtained by a combination of those who fear a more advanced Ministry and those who fear a less advanced one.

As a leader of the House from a purely party point of view M. Clemenceau has had few, if any, equals in French politics. He has in a remarkable degree that quality which goes so far in France—wit. No living politician is such an adept at making his opponents look absurd. And it is fatal in France to be made to look absurd. The French do not like people that "pontificate"; the habit of pontificating is one of M. Jaurès' chief drawbacks, and his influence, great as it is, would be greater still if he could completely cure himself of it. M. Clemenceau never pontificates; his tone is always "je m'enfichiste." He gives it to be understood that he does not care a straw whether he stays in office or not, and, therefore, he stays. A party leader of the type of Gladstone would be an utter failure in France; it is just when the French are the most serious that they like to appear the least so.

Whether M. Clemenceau has been so successful in legislation and administration as in debate is another question, as to which there are two opinions on that side of the House where alone he has declared that he will look for a majority. Discontent with the present Ministry has been steadily growing in volume for some time past in the Radical, and still more the Socialist-Radical, group. Recent incidnts have brought it to a head, and, as I said here some little time ago, there are signs of the formation of a powerful combination with the object of effecting a change of Government. Moreover, it is an open secret that there are two parties in the Government itself, which are not on the best of terms. The relations between M. Clemenceau and M. Briand, which for some time past have not been extremely cordial, are now very strained. So much is this the case that it is even said that M. Briand is the candidate of the malcontents for the Premiership, and it is certainly the fact that the newspapers representing the "Combistes," as the dissentients are called with more or less justification, combine their attacks on M. Clemenceau with a more than tenderness for M. Briand, M. Viviani, and certain other Ministers. This is even true of the Socialist organ, the "Humanité," which for a long time past has treated M. Briand with marked respect, and carefully excepted him from its criticisms of the Government which are not of the mildest. I have not the least idea whether M. Briand entertains the ambitions with which he is credited. If so, his position is rather an anomalous one, and there is something in the opinion expressed in certain quarters that he ought to have resigned long ago.

In any case the present political situation is curious and interesting. Who would have thought that M. Clemenceau would have lived to be the hope of the Centre and the "Temps"? Yet so it is. The lugubrious forecasts of ruin and revolution which the leading organ of the haute bourgeoisie serves up to its readers every afternoon are relieved only by a tempered confidence in the ability of M. Clemenceau to stem the torrent. It is but a tempered confidence, for the "Temps" cannot wholly approve of M. Clemenceau. On the one hand he is committed to the Income Tax, that hated innovation which will bring the revolution to our very doors and force millionaires to declare the amount of their incomes in order to facilitate spoliation. On the other hand, he does not come up to the ideal of the "Temps" in regard to administration. The "Temps" and the party which it represents are in favor of absolute liberty for capitalists and clericals, and wish to restrict the functions of the State almost entirely to the protection of the life and property of the bourgeoisie; they regard old age pensions as demoralising, and the nationalisation of railways as oppression. But they are eager for the repression of trade unionists and anti-militarists, and the desire of school teachers and other public officials to combine for the protection of their interests is to them a crime against the State. As there are still anti-militarists and trade union leaders at large, and as the Government has not expelled from the service every teacher who dares to join a union, the "Temps" is not satisfied with M. Clemenceau.

On the other hand, there is a strong feeling in the Radical Party that M. Clemenceau has gone much too far in the direction of satisfying the "Temps" and its friends. One may disapprove—most sensible people do—of the vagaries of the wirepullers of the Confédération Générale du Travail, who owe their position to a preposterous system of representation, or rather of non-representation. But one does not like to see men kept in prison without a trial for eight months when there is no serious evidence against them. That was the case of the leaders of the Confédération arrested in connection with the riots at Villeneuve, Saint George's, and Draveil, who, it is said, were finally released only because M. Briand and M. Viviani threatened to resign if they were not. When M. Ribot was Foreign Minister and France was almost governed by the Russian Secret Police, it was a common thing for innocent persons to be imprisoned for weeks and months without a trial. But the antecedents of M. Clemenceau did not lead one to expect that he would take M. Ribot as a model.

Again, the frequent Press prosecutions have caused surprise and irritation. I do not share the views of M. Hervé and the staff of the "Guerre Sociale," and they are certainly not shared by the vast majority of the French people. But five years' imprisonment for an article, however objectionable, is a little strong. That was the sentence passed the other day on two of the staff of the "Guerre Sociale" as the result of a Government prosecution, for the crime of attacking General Amade.

The critics of the severity shown towards the extremists of the Left contrast it with the leniency shown towards the Royalists and Clericals, whose papers have for months carried on a campaign of open sedition and unscrupulous slander. We have had a revival of the affaire, accompanied by incitements to the assassination of Major Dreyfus, which Grégori tried to translate into action; we have had the Félix Faure legend dished up, and the credulous readers of the Clerical Press have been told that that "solennel nigaud," as M. Marcel Sembat cruelly called him, was murdered by Dreyfusards, and died a martyr to the faith, like Henry and Syveton, while the Rector of the Catholic Institute of Paris, Mgr. Baudrillart, has publicly declared that "en Félix Faure fut incarné tout l'honneur national"; we have seen the son of the President of the Republic accused in two daily papers of murdering a man with whom he had scarcely a bowing acquaintance, in order to possess himself of the victim's wife, whom he had never met.

It may be wise to treat these last desperate efforts of a discredited faction with silent contempt, but in that case why not treat in the same way the vaporings of fanatics on the other side, who have even fewer followers? If a writer on the "Guerre Sociale" gets five years for a seditious article, why should that eminent Academician, M. Jules Lemâitre, go scot free when he explicitly advocates in the "Action Française" a resort to violence in order to restore the Monarchy?

The tenderness of M. Clemenceau even for the susceptibilities of the Pope is quite astonishing. He it is who has prevented up to the present the publication of the remainder of the Montagnini papers, which are far more compromising for the Vatican and its agents in France than the small selection that has been given to the world. It can hardly be wondered that there is discontent in the Radical Party. The dissentients declare that the Clemenciste policy has led to a recrudescence of Nationalism and Militarism, to the complete disorganisation of the Left, and to the paralysis of the great majority pledged to social reform which was sent to Parliament in 1906.

I will not repeat the mistake of prophesying the fall of the Government. It may be that the factors which have hitherto kept M. Clemenceau in power will keep him in power for some time to come. But it is certain that the elements opposed to the Ministry have recently been consolidated, and have greatly increased in strength. Since the Socialist Congress at Toulouse there has been an implicit understanding between the Socialists and the "Combistes," the first fruits of which were the bye-elections on December 20th at Charolles and Villefranche. The unexpected results of those elections have dealt a severe blow to the prestige of the Ministry, the effects of which will be felt in the Chamber. Perhaps, indeed, they have been felt already, for just before the close of the Session a motion demanding the release of all the persons arrested in connection with the Draveil riots, though opposed by the Government, was defeated by a majority of only eight. The "rectifications" which the curious practice of voting by proxy in the French Chamber always produces, show that there was in reality a majority for the motion, although, of course, the practical result is not affected. Naturally the Right, which has demanded more severe measures against the rioters, voted for their release, but whether or not a defeat of the Government were brought about by the help of the Right, it would be the Left that would gain by it.

Another important factor in the situation is the reconstitution of the "Délégation des Gauches," that is of the old organisation of the bloc, which had ceased to exist during the present Parliament. It is denied that the reconstitution has been undertaken in a spirit of hostility to the Government, and, as all the groups of the Left (except, of course, the Unified Socialists) are sending delegates to the Executive, this must be believed. But it is certain that the most active promoters of the reconstitution are not too friendly to the Ministry, and equally certain that the Délégation will be a check on the power which M. Clemenceau has hitherto wielded in the Chamber. Should there be on any question widespread disapproval of the Ministerial policy, the existence of the Délégation will enable that disapproval to be concentrated.

During the holidays two events have occurred which may strengthen the hands of the Anti-Ministerialist Radicals. One is the assault on the President, the other the condemnation by the Dijon Court of Appeal of a teacher named Morizot, prosecuted by a clerical parent for some remarks made by him in class. Some of M. Morizot's remarks were unpleasing enough, but the judgment of the Court implies that no teacher may speak disrespectfully of the soldiers of the First Empire without exposing himself to penalties. Such a decision is more worthy of the Roman Curia than of a law court of a Republic. The Government is not, of course, responsible for the judgment, but it is blamed for not having pushed forward the promised legislation for preventing such prosecutions, and for having encouraged the spirit which makes such judgments possible. As for the assault on the President, it is regarded as the climax of a campaign towards which the Government has been too complacent. It must be admitted that the freedom of the Press does not require that newspapers should be allowed to accuse every executive official and his relations of murder. A Radical Deputy has already given notice of an interpellation on this subject as soon as Parliament meets.

Nevertheless, as I have already said, M. Clemenceau may once more weather the storm. It is not certain that the advanced party which alone could replace the present Ministry would have a sufficient majority, even with the support of the Socialists. A more moderate Ministry than the present one could not possibly hold office, except as a stop-gap. Therefore, the present Ministry may be retained faute de mieux.—Yours, &c.,

GREETING THE CONSTITUTION AT BEYROUT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—You may be interested in the following extracts from my diary at Beyrout:—

December 17th.—About 1.30 I strolled up to the great open square known as the Burge. A large and animated crowd had gathered, and the scene in its color scheme wore the brilliance and diversity which in these Eastern cities cannot fail to impress a Western onlooker. The red fez prevailed everywhere, but the European coats of Constantinople were largely replaced by the flowing shawls of Bedouins. The crowd soon became densely packed. An unusual number of Moslem women, with veil and headdress, turned out to see the show. People, carriages, animals, jostled each other indiscriminately. At times the horses of the cavalry lined up in front, backed in amongst the motley throng, on one occasion knocking a woman down, but no one appeared to be damaged seriously.

Various processions of students or schoolboys passed, notably one of Armenians dressed in white, with red bands over the shoulder, somewhat resembling English choir-boys. The Syrians feel very kindly to the Armenians, because having suffered much they are yet thoroughly patriotic. At the proclamation of the Constitution Turkish soldiers and Armenians fraternised and wept together! Some Armenians, finely dressed and mounted, let fly a number of pure white pigeons with blood marks on their wings, denoting the contrast between the former massacres and the present peace. In the procession three young Armenian girls, dressed to represent Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity, also released white pigeons at intervals.

When the time came for speeches the speakers did not secure much of a hearing, owing to the continual pistol firing which went on. All the cartridges, as far as I could ascertain, contained ball. It was not obvious at the time, but a boy and a woman are said to have been wounded, and an officer killed on the spot. The officer was an Austrian who had entered the Turkish service and become a Moslem. Natives do not disturb themselves about an incident of this kind; they simply say, "It was his fate"!

Public gatherings of this kind are so new here it would be too much to expect a high degree of order and organisation. On the other hand, the crowd was thoroughly good-tempered; no disputing or quarrelling anywhere. Moslems, Greeks, Maronites, &c., all joined in the general rejoicings. Even the smugglers contributed their quota (a decidedly picturesque item) in the shape of a camel carrying paniers, bedecked with flags. One panier held a man and a girl; the other two girls, one with a tambourine. A small boy was perched up on the top of the animal. The smugglers here are described as rich people, very good-natured and polite, the only drawback being the way in which they earn their living.

A large wooden platform had been erected in the square and decorated with floral festoons. Some of the planking soon gave way, but this was not allowed to make any difference. People swarmed up every roof, balcony, scaffolding, and tree available. Outside, sellers of fruits and sweetmeats busily plied their trades. Near the head of the procession a gap was continually being made and re-made whenever any relaxation of the pressure of the crowd permitted. In this gap two or three men, one quite a youth, maintained a sword dance. The way in which they succeeded amidst all the swaying throng in not chopping anybody's head off was a marvel. Two of the men would crouch down at the ends of the open space, then leap up, shower each other with blows, clashing their blades, and then retreat again to the furthest limits. Besides these, brilliantly dressed men, bearing lances and scimitars, held mock tournaments in Arab style. But perhaps the strangest performance was given by a group of boatmen, who joined hands in a ring, singing the while a peculiar, mournful-sounding song. Two in the centre uttered a strange wailing noise, whereupon one was immediately lifted shoulder high and carried along, gesticulating both with a gun and his hands. He sang a curious jingle with seven beats, which the others took up, clapping their hands to the jingle. When one bearer tired, the man was handed over to another. As he beat time he would revolve all round, like a conductor leading his orchestra. The native mind enjoys doggerel poetry, and the boatmen are noted for their capacity as clappers.

When the Wali found he could not be heard in the open square he went to the Young Turks' Society Hall, where he entertained to tea all the Consuls and principal men of the city. Speeches were made by Dr. Post (U.S.) and the German Consul, by one of the Sheiks, and by the Bishop of the Greek Orthodox Church. The latter told how he used to have to go many times a week on his people's business to the Government offices. Now he need go but rarely. The editor of one of the local papers not unfittingly denounced the habit of pistol firing. So in its own easy-going Oriental fashion, but with wonderful unanimity, Beyrout celebrated the advent of a Turkish Parliament!

It ought perhaps in fairness to be added that the fine American college at Beyrout must be credited with long years of training for the happy change which has now come to pass locally. It numbers this year 868 students. There are 127 Moslems (as against 110 last year); Greek Orthodox, 338; Protestant, 153; Jews, 85; Greek Catholic, 43; Greek Armenian, 28; Maronite, 26; Druses, 20; Copts, 16.—Yours, &c.,

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE LORDS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—While every genuine Liberal is in full sympathy with your idea that the "dominant issue shall be dominant," it may be pertinent to suggest the necessity of recognising two essential factors before the contest is commenced:—

1. The controversial points over which a graceful surrender is the most tactful policy.

2. Certain legislation, which, because of its national character, the Lords will only oppose with considerable danger to their own existence.

It has been emphatically suggested by the "Daily News" that the Government were weak in accepting the Lords' amendment to the Miners' Bill with reference to windings, and that such an agreement was no fitting prelude to the great conflict; yet this attitude was only adopted after full discussion with Mr. Enoch Edwards and other Miners' representatives, and it would certainly have been foolish to preface a struggle where principle is concerned, by disputing a point of detail.

The second factor is best illustrated by a suggestion made in your leading article of last week's issue—that the provision for sickness, invalidity and unemployment, cannot be successfully brought within the category either of finance or non-contentious legislation. Such a Bill, "conceived on true humanitarian lines," if the Lords reject, the country will reject them. It is difficult to appreciate their virtue in throwing out either the Education or the Licensing Bills, but their wisdom is apparent, because both these legislative schemes only appeal to certain sections of the community.

The Government cannot afford at this stage, to make a false step, and for this reason, surely, it is all important that the lead given the electorate by the Liberal Press shall not only be strong, but consistent, practical, and effective.—Yours, &c.,

A. Dykes Spicer.

THE REPRESENTATIVE CHURCH COUNCIL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Whatever lack of representation there may be in the Representative Church Council, there is no lack of misrepresentation in the Dean of Ripon's letter.

His plaint is divided into four paragraphs.

With regard to the first, the Council is not "primarily a conjunction of the two Convocations," and the Convocations do not resolve themselves into Committees for the purpose of meeting in London; the Committees of the whole Houses are formed for the purpose of Joint-sessions of Convocation, which are quite distinct from the Representative Church Council. The Dean's statement with regard to the lay members of the Council has evidently been arrived at by some "loose processes," whatever may be said of the methods of lay election.

In paragraph 2 we are told that "no sanction was given by the Crown to the formation of this Council." Quite so, because no such sanction was asked for or required. The Council is a voluntary body, and claims no power of Law.

The Dean also states that "the Council is nothing more than a conspiracy, and a conspiracy aiming at a usurpation." This statement is utterly void of truth. It is not thinkable that a man in the position of the Dean of Ripon could deliberately make any such statement if he had the facts fully and clearly before his mind. The Council was established after thorough discussion, extending over some years, in the Convocations, Houses of Laymen, Diocesan Conferences, ruri-decanal Chapters and Conferences, and less formal meetings of Churchmen throughout the country, and yet we are told it is a "conspiracy." In the Coronation Address of Convocation to the Crown the Council was referred to as follows:—

> "It is our especial privilege to address your Majesty concerning the work of the national Church, and in this regard we desire first to speak of a body which, since your Majesty's accession, has been gradually constituted in pursuance of resolutions passed by both the Houses of Convocation and the House of Laymen in the two Provinces of Canterbury and York. This body, bearing the name of the Representative Church Council, consists of all the Houses which we have mentioned; and thus the Bishops, the clergy, and the laity of both Provinces are brought together for debate and counsel. We hope that thereby, through the grace and blessing of Almighty God, the manifold work to which the Church is called may be the more wisely and faithfully maintained; and that the judgment of Churchmen concerning the affairs of the Church may be formed and uttered with such clearness and confidence as to appeal to the minds and conscience of the nation."

And in his reply the King expresses a hope that measures of reform for extending the usefulness of the Church "may be furthered by the Constitution of the new body to which you refer—the Representative Church Council." The Dean's statement is obviously unjust and unjustifiable; he should frankly withdraw it and humbly apologise for it.

Paragraph 3 says that "no attempt has been made to define the scope and powers of the Council." None so blind as those who will not see! The Representative Church Council is a tentative effort towards a real and effective system of self-government. It is a voluntary body, and, therefore, cannot be "a legislative, or a judicial, or an administrative body" in any legal sense. Its aim is to bring together Bishops, Clergy, and Laity, in one assembly for "debate and counsel." But it is not "merely an assembly for discussion," and it is not "without authority and without responsibility" because it has no legal powers.

Paragraph 4 is chiefly remarkable for an amazing definition of the term Churchmen:—"English Christians who have no quarrel with our present system of government" ; while paragraph 5 has nothing to do with the subject of the letter.

The fact that the Dean has written at the request of "several clergymen," not laymen, has a special interest under the circumstances.—Yours, &c.,

[We publish Mr. Holdsworth's letter though we cannot see that he in any way rebuts the Dean of Ripon's statements. Does Mr. Holdsworth maintain that the Representative Church Council stands for more than a section of the Church?—ED. NATION.]

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In his letter under the above heading in your issue of December 19th the Dean of Ripon states that "a large body of opinion," comprising, he believes, "the majority of Churchmen," is "quite content with the regulation of Church affairs by the national organs"—Parliament, the Privy Council, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. I hope you will allow me a few lines in which to ask whether the Dean seriously contends that Church-people either are, or ought to be, content that Parliament, which includes a good proportion of Roman Catholics, a number of Jews, and a number of atheists, agnostics, and others who do not believe in Christianity at all, should legislate on religious matters. (The claims of the Privy Council as a Church Court, I may remark in passing, stand or fall with the claims of Parliament, which created it.) Such a statement bears its own refutation on its face. The right of Parliament to legislate about Church property may be conceded at once; it falls within the sphere of Cæsar. But that any Roman Catholic, Jew, or atheist, who has got himself returned to the House of Commons, or has been made an English peer, should thereby obtain the right to a share in altering the creed or the liturgy of the Church of England (for that is what legislating for the Church amounts to, or, at the least, includes)—this is a proposition to which I do not think many Church-people will be found willing to assent. Nor is it one that is necessary to the Dean's argument, and I think its injustice needs only to be stated in order to be clearly seen.—Yours, &c.,

AUSTRIA AND BOSNIA-HERZEGOVINA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Having studied the work of Austria amidst its varied nationalities for nearly forty years, allow me to support much that Professor Leon Kellner has said in your issue of December 26th.

The work of Austria in Bosnia and Herzegovina, with a Slav-Moslem population, has been of the highest value, and much of that work has been done by Slav officials. I have been in those provinces into the charity schools, and talked with the Moslems whose fathers fought against Austria, but they, the sons, now see well what a change has come over their country under Austrian rule, and are well content. From anarchy, dirt, and corruption, under cruel oppression, to order, cleanly and sanitary rule, and freedom for all creeds and tongues.

Knowing Egypt and our work there, I was continually struck with the parallel of Austria's work in these Moslem provinces; and the same may be said of other provinces, such as Galicia. Where Pole and Ruthenian are free, in a manner very unlike the so-called freedom under German or Russian rule—the town of Lemberg, for example, has become a beautiful city instead of an undrained, dirty, unhealthy spot, as it was in the 'sixties.

That Austria did a justifiable thing at a wrong moment and in an unjustifiable fashion we all agree—even Austrians agree to that—but let us English not be led away by really absurd newspaper paragraphs, ostensibly sent from Servia, about Slav oppression. Austria is no longer a German power. Those who travel in Galicia, Bohemia, Croatia, Moravia, Ishid, Carinthia, and other of the provinces quickly find that, as Professor Kellner states: "It is a preposterous delusion to consider Austria an agency for Pan-German aspirations."

The strange onslaught from so many English journals upon Austria has been brought about by carefully inspired paragraphs, and the really great civilising work done by Austria in Central Europe has been ignored. It is time England remembered this work of her ally, and brought reason to bear, even whilst denouncing an unjustifiable procedure.—Yours, &c.,

JAMES BAKER, F.R.G.S.

December 29th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your Balkan correspondent's statements regarding Bosnia are not so untrue as Maude M. Holbach seeks so strenuously to prove.

His statement (1) that no matter how much a young Serb distinguishes himself in school he has no chance whatever of rising in the Government service, is true; his statement (2) that most of the officials are Austrian, is also true; his statement (3) that they have no knowledge of the Servian language is incorrect.

Maude M. Holbach states she met twelve of these officials during a recent tour in Bosnia, and all spoke Servian and were of Hungarian, Italian, Polish, and Czech nationality. Only one spoke German.

Quite so. The Hungarian was a Croat, the Italian came from the Dalmatia coast, the Pole from Galicia, the Czech from Bohemia, and so probably did the solitary official who spoke German.

The mother tongue (Mutter-Sprache) of each of these men was a Slav language akin to Servian, and all were Austrian subjects born in the Dual Monarchy.

Not one was a Serb born in Bosnia! No. And not one of the soldiers Maude M. Holbach met in garrison there was the same. The red-fezzed Bosnian and Herzegovinian battalions are in Vienna. They will never, whilst Austria can set race against race, do duty further south till hens shed their teeth and rivers flow backwards.

Those who have lived, as I have, for several years in that "Polizei-Staat" Austria can best appreciate this.—Yours, &c.,

DENOMINATIONALISM AND THE ALLOCATION OF RATES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Any proposal emanating from Sir James Southorn for the solution of the education problem merits respectful consideration. He thinks that the allocation of rates by the ratepayers to the several denominations they prefer is a way out of the difficulty, and challenges some reader of THE NATION to say what is wrong with this system, and why a system which works in Canada should not work with us. I will endeavor to make some response to his challenge.

First of all, let me suggest that the "example of Canada" is too comprehensive an expression. In Canada it is not the Dominion but the Province that supervises education; and in all the Provinces the schools are unsectarian except in Quebec, Ontario, Saskatchewan, and Alberta, where there are separate schools for Roman Catholics.

Sir James quotes the statement of a member of the Canadian Ministry that with the small denominations "there were no difficulties," because, their numbers not being large enough for schools of their own, they had no alternative but to go to the municipal (that is, the unsectarian) schools. It is plain that the case would be very different in England. Some of the "small" denominations in the Canadian Provinces would be large denominations in the Mother Country, and the schools under public management might suffer seriously through an alienation of rates, while local finance might as seriously suffer from dislocation. On the last point let local financiers speak; but it seems to me that it would breed endless confusion in this complicated country if the precedent were established of paying rates and then, so to say, having them back again for objects of preference.

But the serious difference between England and the whole of Canada lies in this—that in England there is an Established Church, in Canada there is none. Establishment, with centuries of ecclesiastical and social prestige and power behind it, puts the dominant Church into an artificial position of advantage. It is "the Church," conventionally so regarded; to it it is, accidentally or intentionally, "the thing" to belong; and, in virtue of its position, not only vast numbers of people who "go nowhere," but even criminals and gaol-birds, when called upon for enrolment, enrol themselves as "Church." To this accidental advantage all the influences of an artificially influential Church would be superadded to induce the church-less to allocate their rates to the privately managed schools, and the publicly managed schools would, in proportion, be starved.

In other words, because one particular Church has behind it the prestige of the State, the State schools would suffer, and, therefore, in England allocation of rates would work unfairly.

I do not profess that I have exhausted the case against the policy of allocation, but for the present I am content with the reasons I have advanced.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN MASSIE.

THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE SMALL HOLDINGS ACT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Judging from the correspondence that has lately appeared in your columns on the "Small Holdings," there seems to be strong disapproval and disappointment in regard to the work of the two Commissioners at present in office. The question naturally arises, who are the Commissioners, why were they appointed, and why did not the Government take greater pains to appoint those who were known to the Small Holders as men who understood them and their requirements?

Is it another instance of the Government being afraid of appointing their friends? If so, it seems a grave mistake, for the Commissioners should be men who have studied, thought, and worked for small holdings, men having also had experience of county councils and their ways.

As an illustration of the wrong kind of experience, take that of a land agent. It might be argued that as it is to do with land, a land agent would be suitable for a Commissioner. No more erroneous idea is possible. First, the majority of land agents can value land, but they have no idea of the suitability of various kinds of land for small holding cultivation. Secondly, land agents, as a class, are strongly opposed to small holdings, and to appoint such men would be an ingenious method of destroying the effects of the Act.

If the Act is a failure under the present Government, who are supposed to be in its favor, is it likely to succeed under their opponents, who almost to a man are against it?

Every effort must be put forth while the present Government is in power to make the Act a real benefit, otherwise its failure is assured, and the rural laborer will put the blame upon the Liberal Government for passing a Bill, the provisions of which they had not the courage to enforce.—Yours, &c.,

CHAIRMAN OF A RURAL DISTRICT LIBERAL ASSOCIATION.

MORE MESSAGES FROM MYERS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I can heartily accept Professor Huxley's figures about our brain capacity and that of the baboon; though, in fact, I wrote erroneously from memory that our civilised brains were five times as large as the largest ape-brain, I ought to have written three times, though the correction is immaterial to the argument.

When it is a question of a gap in continuity, however, it is fair to follow Mr. Clodd and compare, not ours, but the lowest human brain, of 63 cubic inches, with the gorilla's of 34½ cubic inches. The fact that the links extend in civilised humanity for a long way, up to a brain of 114 cubic inches, does not affect the question of continuity, nor, with all respect to Professor Huxley, impair the "significance" of the gap. When once you enter the human region there are no gaps, there are skulls of every intermediate size. This is all in favor of my view that a spiritual endowment is in us, something physical superadded to what there was before man, the cause and the effect, in aeonian reaction, of this great increase in brain content, and not unlikely to survive the grave.

I did not say anything about a difference "in kind" between our mental apparatus and that of animals. I am as shy of "differences in kind" as I am of the "identity" I criticised. Evolutionists know that differences in kind are only accumulated differences in degree. My plea is that the great increase in brain might not unreasonably or im probably carry psychical elements more enduring than their physical basis.

But all this materialist synthesis of man is partial and unsatisfying. It explains little of what we want explaining, and its conclusions are hazy. We do not know that mental power varies directly with brain capacity, or even with brain surface, which is more likely. The connection may be complex or indirect.

But if there be not sufficient discontinuity to bar animals out, as argued above, by all means let them come in, and let their spark of life dimly survive, in a degree becoming their station.

Above all, let us give heed to the facts first of all. These have not yet been seriously attacked.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN W. GRAHAM.

MOORE'S "LALLA ROOKH."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have just seen Mr. Crawshay-Williams' reply to my letter. I must apologise to him for suggesting that he had never seen the island, and I accept his statement about the exact words used by Moore. In the edition that I saw, the expression was "golden wine."

But I think that Mr. Crawshay-Williams does not touch the real point of my letter. That was, that Moore's poem relates to the seventeenth century, and that his remark about the vines was justified by the descriptions given by travellers in that century. And Lord Curzon's statement about the cultivation of grapes on the island seems to show that Kishm still deserves to be called fertile. It seems probable, indeed, that the island owes its name to its viticulture, for Kishmish, which is the form used by Tavernier, means in Persian a raisin, and also a small grape without stones. Mr. Crawshay-Williams speaks of it as a small island, but according to Blackie's Imperial Gazetteer it is sixty miles long!

With regard to Bendemeer, I beg to observe that I did not write of its flowing through Shiraz. It lies to the N.E. and E. of it, and, according to the Gazetteer already referred to, there is a village on it called Bendemeer, thirty miles N.E. Shiraz. But there must be navigating channels deriving from the river, and these may come nearer the city. At all events, Tavernier, who was my authority, says, "Cette rivière de Bend-emir arrose tout le vignoble de Schiras," and a little lower down he styles it "cette rivière de Bend-emir ou de Schiras." But the question is not about the distance of the Bend-emir from Shiraz, but about the nature of its scenery, and the possibility or otherwise of its harboring bulbuls (Persian nightingales).—Yours, &c.,

H. BEVERIDGE.

MR. ARCHER'S CRITICISM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—No wonder that Mr. St. John Hankin resents Mr. Archer's attack upon his play, and I, for one, would egg him on to the combat while objecting to his use—misleading as I think—of the ugly word "ratted." Surely the legend about rats deserting a sinking ship is inapplicable to our latest drama. I trust it is in no such desperate plight. Besides, to "rat" carries with it an implication of cowardice and meanness quite unwarranted in this connection. Let us leave the objectionable term to professional politicians and theologians, recognising that all opinion which has life in it must needs be constantly flowing and modifying itself.

It is plain, however, that Mr. Archer's change of attitude does not imply vital growth. It is painful to turn from some volumes of dramatic criticism (which I possess) of the 'eighties and 'nineties to his comments on present-day plays. Reading those earlier critiques, one would expect to find Mr. Archer stimulating the modern dramatist who tries to walk in Ibsen's paths, and applauding any sincere and impersonal presentation of life and character that has thrown off theatrical sentimentality and convention. For that seems to be Mr. Hankin's aim—and achievement—in "The Last of the De Mullins." But no support or help in this difficult enterprise comes to him from that quarter. The frank brutality of Hedda Gabler found Mr. Archer not merely tolerant but admiring, but now after sixteen years he is scandalised by the brave outspokenness of Janet de Mullins. To Mrs. Alving, Nora, and other of the Master's creations it is permitted to "épater les bourgeois" to their heart's content. The dramatic heroine of a later day is expected to be gentle, tactful, what is called "womanly." It is curious to note how closely Mr. Archer follows the anti-Ibsenite of the past in assuming that Janet's tirade in the last act must needs represent Mr. Hankin's personal point of view, and not the feminist revolt so brilliantly characterised in your columns by Mrs. Vaughan Nash. One cannot but be reminded of the Clement Scott school of critics, who denounced Ibsen as a criminal, because, said they, he incited the wife to desert home and children, and the bachelor girl to beguile the man from his lawful spouse. Original dramatic work obtains from Mr. Archer nowadays little but faint praise, more often undisguised censure, as in the case of Mr. Hankin's play. The only exception I recollect is his appreciative review of Mr. Barker's "Waste." Enthusiastic praise he reserves for certain plays by Mr. Pinero where action and morality are alike stagey, and the social life depicted a grotesque caricature of reality.

If you insert this letter, I shall be glad of the opportunity to thank Mr. Hankin for his interesting and life-like play, and Miss McCarthy for her splendidly convincing acting.—Yours, &c.,

THE BOOKS OF 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I suggest the following additions to your list of the noteworthy books of 1908: "National Idealism and the Book of Common Prayer," by Stanton Coit; "Mediævalism," by Father Tyrrell; "Trade and Tariffs," by J. M. Robertson, M.P.; "Moral Instruction and Training in Schools," 2 vols., edited by Professor Sadler; "The New Spirit in India," by H. W. Nevinson. As you mention the Cambridge Modern History, I must plead for the admission of "The Cambridge History of English Literature," vol. 2, with Professor Manly's epoch-making discussion of the authorship of Piers Plowman.—Yours, &c.,

SIR,—In your selected list of the books of abiding interest published in 1908, I think you might, in the matter of fiction, have allowed yourself to be guided more by the admirable criticisms that have appeared in your own pages. Personally, I owe a debt of gratitude to your critic for drawing my attention to Mr. Richardson's powerful story, "Maurice Guest," the one English novel of the year—or, for that part, of several years—which has introduced a new and serious note into our fiction. Here, it seems to me, we have for the first time in English, something of that fine insight into the workings of the soul, that psychological realism for which we have hitherto had to go to the Russians and the French. This book, surely, deserves a place in your list.—Yours, &c.,

AXIOMS OR FALLACIES?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The letters of Miss Black and Mr. Nevinson published in the current NATION invite certain questions.

It is difficult to see why women, any more than men, should be enfranchised by marriage. The claim to be so by women is one for preferential treatment. Is that at all likely to be granted?

As to the serious reduction in some branches of women's industry within the last fifteen years or so, is it not very much a case of supply and demand? Are not the workers more numerous now than then? Have not the various attempts of Parliament to fix wages in the long past been abortive or mischievous, or both? And what grounds have we for believing that the present Legislature would be more successful?—Yours, &c.,

DEATH IN THE WOODS.

WHEN I am gone, and you alone are living here still,
You'll think of me when splendid the storm is on the hill,
Trampling and militant here—what of their village street?—
For the baying of winds in the woods to me was music sweet.

Oh, for the storms again, and youth in my heart again!
My spirit to glory strained, wild in this wild wood then,
That now shall never strain—though I think if the tempest should roll
I could rise and strive with death, and smite him back from my soul.

But no wind stirs a leaf, and no cloud hurries the moon;
I know that to-night our lake with stars and shadows is strewn—
A night for a villager's death, who will shudder in his grave
To hear—alas, how long!—the winds above him rave.

How long! Ah death, what art thou, a thing of calm or of storms?
Or twain—their peace to them, to me thy valiant alarms?
Gladly I'd leave them this corpse in their churchyard to lay at rest
If my wind-swept spirit could fare on the hurricane's kingly quest.

And, sure, 'tis the fools of knowledge who feign that the winds of the world
Are but troubles of little calms by the greater calm enfurled:
I know them for symbols of glory, and echoes of one Voice dread
Sounding where spacious tempests house the great-hearted dead.

And what but a fool was I, crying defiance to death,
Who will lead my soul from this calm to mingle with God's very breath!
Who will lead me hither, perchance, while you are waiting here still,
Sighing for thought of me when the winds are out on the hill.

THOMAS MACDONAGH.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

MR. J. A. HOBSON has just completed a lengthy study of present economic conditions, which will be published in the early spring under some such title as "The Industrial System." Its main purpose is to show how far and in what ways competition and combination are operative forces in the distribution of wealth. With this object, Mr. Hobson applies a new method of analysis to the payment for the use of land, labor, capital, and ability, and in the process he establishes a fundamental distinction between the economically necessary "costs of production" and an "unproductive surplus." Upon an exposition of the nature of this "surplus," he founds a principle of taxation and a theory of the true limits of Socialism in modern industrial States. The book also contains a description of the concrete structure and working of modern industry, special attention being given to the part played by the financier. Although political economy has lost the popularity with which J. S. Mill invested it, a book of this sort coming from so powerful and original a thinker as Mr. Hobson can hardly fail to rouse much interest, and we may add, to exert a considerable influence, however unwelcome it may be to the orthodox economists.

PUBLISHERS are already busy with their spring lists, and in another few weeks we shall be able to judge of the prospects of the season—at least, from the reader's point of view. There is a likelihood that biography will be quite as much in vogue as it has been of late, though there is a growing feeling that the demand for this class of book is falling off. Anniversary celebrations usually call forth one or more biographies of the person commemorated, and 1909 is unusually rich in anniversaries. Here is a list of some distinguished people who were born in 1809:—

Edgar Allan Poe	Jan. 19th.
Mendelssohn	Feb. 3rd.
Darwin	Feb. 12th.
Lincoln	Feb. 12th.
Fitzgerald	Mar. 31st.
Lord Houghton	June 19th.
Mrs. Cowden-Clarke	June 22nd.
J. S. Blackie	July 29th.
Kinglake	Aug. 5th.
Tennyson	Aug. 6th.
O. W. Holmes	Aug. 29th.
Fanny Kemble	Nov. 27th.
Mark Lemon	Nov. 30th.
Gladstone	Dec. 29th.

This year also sees the centenary of Thomas Paine's death on June 8th; the bicentenary of the birth of the first Lord Lyttelton, on January 17th; that of Dr. Johnson, on September 18th; the tercentenary of Sir John Suckling's birth, on February 10th and of the first Lord Clarendon's on February 20th. Finally, there is the centenary of the "Quarterly Review," the first number of which was published in February, 1809.

GREAT preparations are being made in America to celebrate the centenary of Poe's birth. Among other things, "The Southern Messenger," the newspaper of which Poe was editor, will, as we mentioned some months ago, be revived, and, judging from the support promised, will become a literary organ of value. In this country the occasion will be marked by the issue of a new edition of Poe's poems in Messrs Routledge's "Muses' Library," with a lengthy introduction by Mr. J. H. Ingram, who is the author of a biography of Poe.

WE learn that Mr. Charles Roden Buxton has written a book on the Turkish Revolution, which will be published shortly by Mr. Fisher Unwin. Part of this volume has already seen the light in the shape of articles in the "Daily Chronicle" and the "Westminster Gazette," written from Constantinople during the election and the assembling of the Turkish Parliament. Readers of the "Independent" and "Albany" will remember Mr. Buxton's graceful work, as well as the editorial capacity which he applied to the later of these reviews.

THE Concordance Society, which was organised at Yale in 1906, has completed a "Concordance to the English Poems of Thomas Gray," which will be issued in this country by Messrs. Constable. It is edited by Professor A. S. Cook, who has been aided by several members of the society, Mr. Gosse's edition of Gray in the "Eversley Series" being used as the basis of the work. Mention of Gray prompts us to ask how long shall we have to wait for the final volume of Mr. Tovey's excellent edition of Gray's "Letters," which Messrs. Bell have in progress. The first volume appeared in 1900, the second in 1904, and at the same rate of progress the third volume should have been published last year. The delay is to be regretted, for Mr. Tovey's work is in all respects superior to that of former editors of Gray's correspondence.

IN addition to Professor Eucken's "The Life of the Spirit," the translation of which is having a large sale, another work by the same author will soon be made accessible to English readers. This is "Die Lebensanschauungen," which has been translated by Professor Boyce Gibson, and will be issued by Messrs. A. & C. Black during the coming season. Professor Gibson's volume "Rudolf Eucken's Philosophy of Life," published in 1906, was the first book in this country to deal with the German thinker.

WE learn that a volume of Mr. R. B. Cunninghame-Graham's stories and sketches will be published towards the end of the month. This is good news, for though he is not a popular author in the sense that his books have the huge circulation that nowadays seems reserved for work which has no claim to be called literature, Mr. Cunninghame-Graham's writing has a distinction of style and an ironic subtlety that commend it to every lover of letters.

WHAT is the secret of Montaigne's charm? Possibly the answer is to be found in the first sentence he addresses to his reader, "C'est icy un livre de bonne foy, lecteur." At any rate, he has always been the favorite author of a certain type of mind, and, almost from the publication of the "Essays," he was accepted in England as if he had been an English writer. Florio's translation is one of the standard works of English literature, and a fresh edition of it may be expected from every publishing firm of any pretensions. The latest to appear in three fine, beautifully printed volumes bears the imprint of Mr. Grant Richards, and is introduced by Mr. Thomas Seccombe. One becomes a little weary of praising the uniform excellence of Mr. Seccombe's introductions; but if a new introduction to Montaigne had to be written, Mr. Seccombe was undoubtedly the man to do it. He gives a concise account of Montaigne's life, interspersed with bits of criticism, ingeniously calculated to whet the reader's interest, and make him feel that Montaigne is the author who will do most to help him to enjoy life or to endure it. And what method could be adopted in writing an introduction to a classic? "Just as Spenser is the poet's poet, and Sterne the novelist's novelist," says Mr. Seccombe, "so Montaigne is, in a peculiar sense, the prose-writer's prose-writer, and source of inspiration to all subsequent character-students and essayists. To 'pour oneself out like old Montaigne,' has become, consciously or unconsciously, the ideal of every personal writer, from La Bruyère and Pascal onwards. He has, indeed, scattered his pollen broadcast over La Bruyère, Montesquieu, Rousseau, Sterne, Charles Lamb, Thoreau, and Emerson." But in addition to his revelation of his own personality, and his frank utterance of feelings and moods which most of us refuse to admit even to ourselves, Montaigne has another quality which will always make him read—his rich fund of practical wisdom. In this he closely resembles Bacon—who borrowed from him the title of his best-known work—and it is, perhaps, for this reason that English readers, so insular in many ways, have looked upon him as almost one of themselves.

THE WILL TO POWER.*

Nietzsche has not been taken so seriously in England as in Germany and France, mainly because of his English disciples and exponents. In this country he has fallen into the hands of a knot of enthusiasts, who have praised the "master" without stint or discrimination, and have accepted or exaggerated all his inconsistencies. Without possessing his supreme felicity of style they have imitated his dogmatism and violence, and have rendered their pages unpleasant by furious abuse of such things—the Christian religion, for instance—as Nietzsche did not happen to like. And the English Nietzschean is often of opinion that he faithfully carries out the teacher's precepts by representing himself as a devil of a fellow, dancing gaily and supermannishly over all the established moralities. This attitude, even if it may be tolerated in the case of a man of genius, becomes offensive and wearisome when affected by the minor literary person. There is an excellent example in the Introduction which Dr. Oscar Levy has written for Mr. Ludovici's book:—

> "You are young and the sort of fellow the women, who form the principal part of audiences in your country, will listen to. They will pretend to understand—women are very clever in pretending to understand. Instead of finding yourself upon a new continent you may, therefore, land in matrimony, and then get back all your lectures—free of charge—by the lecturing sex par excellence, women. Do not listen to them. Do not condescend. Don't marry yet. Remember that even the apostles of the old creed, though followed by women, did not marry them."

This seems silly and rather vulgar, considering that it is the preface to a series of lectures originally delivered to an audience of University students. Nor are the lectures themselves quite in the dispassionate academic tone one might expect. There is no reason why the University of London should not get clever young gentlemen to lecture on Nietzsche or on any other popular literary figure; but the authorities might impress upon the lecturer that he is after all supposed to be engaged upon an educational task. Mr. Ludovici has worked up his subject well, and much that he says upon the genesis of the Nietzschean ideas is useful. But his language is that of an angry and, at times, a rancorous partisan. A little more professional, if not philosophic, calm is desirable in those who are imparting instruction to the young.

Mr. Mügge's book is more valuable. It is the best and most impartial account of Nietzsche and his works which has yet appeared in English, and it can be recommended as a trustworthy handbook to those about to begin the study of this strange genius. The writer is an admirer of Nietzsche; but his admiration does not carry him to the point of abandoning his critical faculty. Mr. Ludovici and others insist upon regarding Nietzsche as the creator of a complete and harmonious philosophical system, consistent in all its parts. Mr. Mügge, with sounder judgment, points out that there was nothing systematic about the philosopher, if philosopher he was. How, indeed, could there be? Nietzsche crammed an enormous amount of productive work into some dozen years of ill-health and wandering, before the end came upon him with insanity at five-and-forty. He had neither the leisure, nor the knowledge, nor the detachment of mind to work out a system; and, as Mr. Mügge shows, even during the short period of his literary activity he changed his standpoint several times, so that we may trace in him at least three different and well-marked phases of thought. It is as difficult to extract from him a coherent philosophy of life and conduct as it is to perform the same process with Rousseau, Emerson, Carlyle, or Walt Whitman. He belongs, like these men, to the class of the rhapsodists, the prophets, the impressionists, the prose-poets, the seers: those who reveal to the world the inward light and flame kindled by the intensity of their own emotions. The fire broke from Nietzsche in bursts and flashes. He hardly took the trouble to construct a book. Most of his works are mere bundles of aphorisms, throbbing with vitality and significance, but fragmentary and uncoordinated like the verses of the prophetic books in the Old Testament. He should be read and judged as the poets are for his suggestion and inspiration, rather than for his appeal to the intellect. For he was of the bardic order, a vates—not perhaps sacer—more than a thinker.

But nobody can doubt that he has been, as the phrase goes, a dynamic influence on our age: a "shaker of things" we called him in these pages some months ago. With his marvellous power of expression he gave articulate form to many of the ideas which had been simmering in some of the best minds among his contemporaries. He gathered up the shards and débris that had been left by the ravaging inroad upon old beliefs and conventions made by such writers as Schopenhauer, Spencer, Darwin, Stendhal, and Stirner; he passed the broken vestiges through his superheated furnace and hurled them forth in a shower of hard, polished, penetrating projectiles. If he had been merely an iconoclast he would have had less effect. But out of the nebulous atmosphere in which he moved he crystallised half-a-dozen radiant ideas, that struck like flaming arrows to the heart of his generation. Illogical, these formative thoughts may be called, ill-reasoned, immoral, dangerous; but they were winged with what to many has seemed, and will seem, living fire. Like Carlyle, like Ruskin, like Matthew Arnold, he denounced that nineteenth century ideal, in which Progress was envisaged as the universal diffusion of an ignoble comfort. His attack on the "herd-morality" shocked and startled the conventionally virtuous; but it was a message of hope to the ardent and enterprising. "I do not advise you to labor but to fight. You say that a good cause will hallow even war. I tell you that a good war hallows every cause." And elsewhere he pleasantly observes:—

> "The man who is truly free tramples underfoot the contemptible species of well-being dreamt of by shopkeepers, cows, women, Englishmen, and other democrats. The free man is a warrior."

Certainly a shaker of things this! It is hard to close the ears to that clamant voice, though the respectable, established person might prefer not to have its owner about his premises.

But this is the incendiary, the "Dionysean," side of Nietzsche. There is the other, the constructive, aspect. To a people who had lost faith in the older sanctions, ethical and religious, and were balancing between the pessimism of Schopenhauer and a sheer materialism, he brought a new ideal. We are told, he says, that the world is only Will and Idea; fleeting shows, which may not be real, with only one force working through them, the force of volition. Very well; but what is this force? Is it the mere instinct for self-preservation? No; but the Will to Power, the effort to render the idea of the species prevalent and dominant. Let us accept that and make it the aim of all our ethics, the goal of our energies; let us live and strive so that in the fullness of time the higher type of man may be evolved. The doctrine of the Superman is vague, dreamy, fantastical, in some ways absurd; but it has "caught on," because it does hint at a meaning, a purpose, in the cosmic process which is not inconsistent with our biological and physiological knowledge. Darwinism, on the Continent, if not in England, was regarded as giving an absolutely scientific warrant to the rule of egoism and self-seeking. Nature did seem to be "one with rapine." But Nietzsche sanctifies its very selfishness and cruelty.

> "I do not advise you to love your neighbor—the nearest human being. I advise you rather to flee from the nearest and love the furthest human being. Higher than love to your neighbor is love to the higher man that is to come in the future. . . . Propagate yourself upward."

It is as the Apostle of that faith in the Future that Nietzsche is being studied so closely abroad; and it is on this ground that, with all his limitations and perversions, we cannot ignore him in England.

THE OPINIONS OF A MODERATE.*

An eminent theologian, the enfant terrible of the Oxford Movement, is said to have broken out in speaking of Archbishop Howley, of the praises of whose "venerableness" and "moderation" he was weary: "If a man be called either venerable or moderate, distrust him: but, if both, be sure he is a scoundrel." Mr. Ward is certainly not a scoundrel; and, except in the sense in which it is applied to Bede, the epithet venerable is unsuited to a writer who is still, happily, in the prime of life. A Moderate, however—the word is used in no disparaging sense—he is by temperament, by conviction, and by position. He would have made an excellent Archbishop. But, as things stand, mitres are not for Moderates. Of the Episcopate, as of the kingdom of Heaven, it may be said, at least under the present Pontificate, that "the violent bear it away."

A Moderate is not necessarily a Trimmer. It is possible to hold sincerely of the controversies of the present what most of us held of those of the past—that neither of the extreme parties was in the right; that the points on which they agreed were more important than those over which they disputed; that for the sake of peace much should be conceded; and that good ends have too often been pursued, and discredited, by bad means A temper which was that of Burke and Newman cannot be set down out of hand as shallow and time-serving. To say that it has the defects of its qualities is another thing. Its danger—a danger which neither of these distinguished men escaped—is to underestimate the value and force of ideas, to fail to rise to the emergencies which periodically break the level of existence, to misread the signs of the times. Burke mistook the Revolution, Newman Liberalism; Mr. Ward misconceives and miscalculates the forces at work in the critical reconstruction of theology to-day. These are more potent and farther reaching than he thinks. The halfway house is no more than a temporary shelter; the logic of ideas and of events takes men to unexpected and, in the earlier stages of the process, unwelcome goals.

In an ingenious parallel between the attitude of Mr. Balfour towards Tariff Reform and of the Roman Church towards Modernism, the wise ruler, Mr. Ward tells us—

> "with whom it lies to decide when a practical step should be taken, inevitably angers extremists on both sides. He will not, apart from the case of an exceptional crisis, silence the Liberals. He knows that it is they who have hold of the materials out of which the true developments in theological exposition are to be effected. . . . On the other hand, he will have none of the dogmatism of the obscurantists. To treat all speculative inquiry as heresy is as bad as to treat its negations as newly won dogma."

This is, no doubt, what should be; and what would be, were kings philosophers and philosophers kings. But it may be doubted whether either Mr. Balfour or Pius X. has succeeded in uniting the parts; Mr. Ward, we fear, is the victim of "The Wish to Believe." Yet, in Bishop Butler's memorable words, "things are what they are." It is a comprehensible, if, for most minds, an over subtle, position which holds that, with all its shortcomings intellectual and moral, the ideas which underlie Catholicism are indispensable; that no other religious system retains, or can retain, them; and that consequently a breach with Rome must be avoided at all costs. Any, or all, of these propositions may be contested; but they have been, and are, held by men from whom, if one differs, one differs with respect. But what is not allowable is the calculated shading, the false perspective, the unreal coloring, the suggestion here, the suppression there, by which an impression is deliberately produced, an effect purposely obtained. This is sophistry. The refusal to face the facts of the situation fairly vitiates the superstructure; to build on this foundation is to build on sand.

Mr. Ward's chapter on Leo XIII. is representative of the school to which he belongs. It must be read with care, and to a certain extent between the lines. The reflections are often judicious; the insight is genuine; the admissions are significant; it is as well that English is little read at Rome. He would be a bold writer who criticised Pius X. as freely as Mr. Ward criticises his predecessor; a greater liberty of speech is, perhaps, granted in reference to a dead than to a living Pope. "In the matter of Biblical criticism he"—Leo—"did not fully appreciate the situation intellectually"; "that he was personally conversant with critical problems practically unknown to his generation is not to be supposed." His letter on Americanism "does not deal with the deeper problem, which was in the mind of those"—here comes the inevitable makeweight—"whose imprudence and excesses are justly condemned." "There was never in his utterances any enthusiasm for the sacred rights of liberty, or even much appreciation of the value of liberty in the search for truth." He accepted the existing order, in so far as he accepted it, with an ulterior motive; "we must use the modern liberties—our ultimate ideal being largely to get rid of them." This being so, that his schemes to capture the Governments and the rising democracy miscarried is not surprising. Their insincerity was obvious; nor, in spite of the veneration which attached to the Pontiff, were his Nuncios personally calculated to inspire either confidence or respect. In France Mr. Ward admits the failure; when he adds that "the Government has carried out—latterly with unparalleled virulence—the policy of the anti-Christian Freemasons," this is merely a theological way of saying that it was, at last and reluctantly, driven to act in self-defence. The temper of the clericals—and it is the same now as then—is illustrated by an anecdote, told with much simplicity, of the writer's student days at Rome.

> "The King was always anxious as he drove in the city to get a salute from a priest or cleric; and we used to go close to the royal carriage and raise our hands as though to doff our hats. The King's hat was off in a moment, and the college boys' hands got no higher than their foreheads, as, with their heads still covered, they returned his gracious smile with a blank stare. This was the most we could do to make the man, who was, in our eyes, no better than a highwayman, smart; and we did it with joy."

Amiable youths! What taste! What breeding! In a similar spirit an official of the Papal court to this day affixes the stamp, bearing the royal effigy, to his letters upside down.

It is with relief that we turn from these wild oats, which strike us as somewhat deficient in quality, to the notable chapters on Wiseman, Manning, and Newman. These are admirable in substance and temper: that on Newman, in particular, being a model of exposition, and forming, we hope, a prelude to a biography of the great cardinal from Mr. Ward's hand. Newman was not originally a High Churchman: trained an Evangelical, his earliest Oxford ties were to the Noetic school.

> "The conviction on which this alliance rested was never changed in him—the conviction, namely, that such traditional opinions as embodied pre-scientific and inaccurate conjectures needed careful revision in view of the circumstances of modern knowledge. What did change was his sense of the relative importance of different truths in their bearing on religion, and his appreciation of the peculiar conditions regulating theological science."

We should rather say that in Newman, as in so many men in whom the temper of the artist is strong, two different lines of feeling and thought lay side by side imperfectly mediated. His distrust of the individual reason threw him back upon an authority whose credentials he accepted on insufficient evidence. Non in dialectica, and, Securus judicat orbis terrarum, were his maxims: he drew a hard and fast line between inward and outward; he took the official teaching of a particular religious community for the collective judgment of mankind. He did not idealise the practical working of the Catholic system; but it is improbable that he ever seriously questioned the conception of religion on which it is based, and of which it is the logical outcome. He was a great divine and a great man of letters. But he was scholarly rather than learned; his philosophy, with all its happy aperçus, was fragmentary; his understanding, critical as it was, was without the scientific training that makes criticism systematic and fruitful. He was the Burke of theology. As Burke swallowed the ancien régime to save society, Newman swallowed the Pope—it is doubtful whether he ever thoroughly digested him—to save God. In neither case was so drastic a course necessary. The great truths of experience do not stand or fall with our apprehension of them; the great facts of life are founded on human nature, which though modified by its varying environment, does not essentially change. The Liberalism which repelled Newman had its limitations; and, in so far as the Oxford Movement was a reaction against these limitations, it had its sufficient reason in itself. If it derailed the religious thought of an important section of the National Church, insulating and stereotyping, it was not because of its protest against what was faulty or one-sided in English religion, but because in protesting it looked back, not forward. The past enters into and moulds the future, but as past it does not return. Would we return to it, the patriarch's wife is our warning: we may not seek the living among the dead.

A HEAVY HERO.*

Mr. Melville has embarked on the romantic task of disabusing the minds of Englishmen of their unfavorable impressions of the character and intellect of George I. His two volumes may or may not be regarded as a success from that point of view, but they are certainly amusing reading. They contain a great deal of curious information about the Court of Hanover, and if anybody wants to know, for example, how much that Court paid its staff, from the doctor to the ratcatcher, he will find the fullest details. The barber was paid six times as much as the Italian painter and five times as much as the French musician. He will learn also that the three hundred and seven persons who composed the Court of Hanover only required the services of two washerwomen. After this we will learn without surprise that when George I. came to England there was only one washerwoman in a suite that contained eighteen cooks, three cellarmen, four pages, a carver, a mistress, a half-sister, and a Lutheran preacher. The arrival of that suite has been described in Thackeray's famous passage about the Archbishop of Canterbury prostrating himself to the head of his Church and Kielmansegg and Schulenburg with their raddled cheeks grinning behind the Defender of the Faith. Mr. Melville thinks the English were captious and difficult to please, and that their dissatisfaction about George's mistresses was caused rather by their looks than by his conduct. But Mr. Melville's own description of the Duchess of Kendal does not tend to correct the general opinion that George's taste was not his strong point, or to justify the suggestion that the English crowd was hypercritical. As a matter of fact, Mr. Melville's picture of George I. is not very different from those drawn by other people. He does not pretend that there was anything very subtle about this plain and simple character. George I. was, in fact, as direct a man as his father, who, when he heard of his brother's death, observed, "Je suis aise que ce n'est pas moy qui sois mort," or as his son, who, when his dying wife urged him to marry again, sobbed out "j'aurai des maitresses." Mr. Melville, it is true, puts George I.'s sense of humour rather higher than other critics have done, but the illustrations given are not very convincing, and when the most has been made of his blunt sallies, we doubt whether many of us would have cared to divide his evenings with the Duchess of Kendal. Mr. Melville gives an entertaining picture of those evenings with George I. sitting for hours together, a glass of beer by his side and a pipe in his mouth, watching the Duchess, of whom Chesterfield said that she was little above an idiot, cut paper into different shapes.

Mr. Melville's complaint that the English were ungracious and ungrateful to the king, who would have greatly preferred to remain in the minor situation of Elector of Hanover, has a certain foundation. But it must be remembered that we are in a far better position to appreciate George's virtues as a king than were his contemporaries. These contemporaries did not foresee the reigns of George III. and George IV. They did not understand that the king's ignorance of the language of his subjects, and his comparative indifference to their affairs, qualities that were not on the surface recommendations to their favor, contributed more than anything else to the establishment of Parliamentary Government in England. If only George III., instead of being an obstinate, uneducated, ambitious, and virtuous man, had copied the character and temperament of his obstinate and uneducated great-grandfather more closely, the 18th century would not have ended so ruinously for England. "Happy were it for Europe, happy for the world, if there were not greater Kings in it." The last sentence of Chesterfield's comments on the character of George I. was the truest of them all. Mr. Melville quotes Dr. Ward's remark that "though his own tendencies were entirely in the direction of absolute government, he mastered rebellion and kept down disaffection without giving the aspect of tyranny to a constitutional rule." We may go further and say that though his own tendencies were entirely in the direction of absolute government, he enabled Walpole to begin to lay the foundations of Cabinet Government to such effect that George III., who tried to put those tendencies into practice, could not quite succeed. We are not called upon to listen to George I.'s wit, or to admire the ladies he admired, or to watch with sympathy his lavish distribution of English money among his Hanoverian friends; we can understand that there was much in his character and ways to try the temper of his subjects. All that we know is that it is a pity all the Georges were not like him.

THE PARSON'S JOKE.*

The English parson has always been typically the Englishman. When we think of him we picture the well-bred, well-dressed, healthy man, sprung from a class that is educated without learning, and comfortable without luxury. He is much of a gentleman, without pride, and much of a churchman, without sanctitude. In Handel's church at Little Stanmore there is a marble effigy of a classic Countess (we think, of Pembroke) more lightly clad than she would have appeared in public, and underneath we are informed that, among all her other virtues, she was "religious without enthusiasm." Probably there is a covert sneer at those heady Wesleyans, who were then making themselves so troublesome. But the description would stand very well for the English parson during the three centuries after the Reformation. And if we have changed all that now, the change is not so recent that none of the type survives.

That, at all events, is the kind of man we find revealed in these collected anecdotes and scraps of history. In all priests and parsons we have a class devoted to the highest service, to the teaching of the most profound truths and the maintenance of the most essential morality; yet, for some reason or other, the English nature has always regarded them with rather a humorous eye, and the present book is little more than a string of funny things. Every now and then, it is true, the author pulls himself up, remembering that he must for decency's sake insert something spiritual, and then we get this sort of writing:—

> "In spite of some changes the glorious cathedrals remain, where for centuries the anthems of praise, the prayer of faith, and the divine services were offered. In the glow of a summer's evening its heavenly architecture, a mass of wondrous beauty, &c. The greensward of the close, bounded by its low wall and high towering elms, wherein the rooks caw and guard their nests, speaks of peace and joy that is not of earth. We walk through the cloisters that once echoed, &c. The deanery is close at hand, a venerable home of peace and learning; and the canons' houses tell of centuries of devoted service to God's Church, wherein many a distinguished scholar, able preacher, and learned writer has lived and set forth his burning message to the world, and now lies at peace in the quiet minster."

Even if we have never lived in a Close, we feel this description to be humbug. We know perfectly well that the greensward and the rooks and all the other picture-postcard accessories do not speak of a peace and joy that is not of the earth; and we know that if a man had a burning message to the world, a Cathedral Close is just the very last place he would choose to set it forth. But these purple bits of flummery are thrown in, as we said, for the sake of decency. The same fate seems to attend the author whenever he seeks to rise to the dignity of his subject; as when he quotes as "one of the finest portraits in literature" the description in "The May Queen," beginning, "But that good man, the clergyman, has told me words of peace"—which we take to be about the most paltry line ever written, unless "A Mr. Wilkinson, a clergyman," beats it by a neck.

But it is in the record of parsonic jests that Mr. Ditch-field really excels, and his collection of witticisms suitable to school-treats and the vicar's table is quite remarkable. The parson's joke is like the parson; it stands alone. It wears, not exactly vestments, but a black coat and an all-round collar. Like the parson's "reverend," it is due to his position. A joke that no layman could make without a shudder will be appreciated from a rector, admired from an archdeacon, and immortalised from a bishop. Magistrates and schoolmasters have something of the same privilege, for when people of that standing smile the rest of the world must roar in deference. Take the chapter here on "Bishops' Wit," for instance; there are many quotations from Wilberforce, who still enjoys an equal reputation for jesting and piety. Was his piety, we wonder, on a level with jokes like these?—

> "One day he was at Banbury, and dined at a farmers' ordinary on a market day. He was not hungry, and declared himself 'Off his feed.' A burly farmer bellowed out: 'Try Thorley's food, my lord.'
